Then some other changes were also made which will make it difficult for municipalities to provide services which they were able to provide before. For instance, some of these changes are enabling the provincial government to retain a greater portion of fines collected on behalf of municipalities. That's what we saw in Calgary, where the Calgary police chief has been saying for a while that their funding has been cut since the province is trying to retain a greater portion of the fines collected, hence that $13 million shortfall in Calgary police funding. That's coming at a time when our communities have raised safety concerns, in particular communities in the northeast. The Member for Calgary-Falconridge will know that they have raised major concerns about violence in our communities, the rise of crime in our communities, and now we are seeing changes through this legislation that will enable the province to change this funding and, I guess, put the safety of Albertans at risk.

Also, there are changes in this piece of legislation with respect to postsecondary education. One, the tuition cap, that was in place for four years, has been suspended. I think the Minister of Advanced Education is the only person who was requested by students to raise their fees and who was told by students that they didn't like the tuition freeze, that they wanted their fees to skyrocket. I think that's what they are doing with this and also making the student loan interest rate go up by 1 per cent. They are also cutting credits for parents with another piece of legislation.

This piece of legislation, the changes contained in Bill 21, if passed, will make life more expensive for Albertans across this province. It's part of their budget where they will want Albertans to believe that their $4.7 billion corporate handout will attract investment, will create jobs, but we haven't seen that. We didn't see investment. We didn't see the jobs. That policy is not paying for itself. Instead, money is taken out of the pockets of Albertans to pay for that failed policy. There is now enough evidence, like we have been saying before they brought forward this policy, that this policy has not worked before. It will not work now. Trickle-down policy doesn't work. Trickle-down is not even in economics. Being a student of economics, I could say that it was just a political scheme. It was never economics by any stretch of that word.

What we are seeing now, that those who are benefiting from that handout – for instance, my colleague earlier mentioned that Husky has received $233 million, and they have not created a single job. I think the Minister of Energy will agree with me that instead they have laid off 371 jobs. That's a public number. They are moving investment away to Wisconsin, Saskatchewan, and the States. They have reduced capital funding. How much more evidence does your side need to reconsider this policy? If any of those things that I am saying are not correct, I invite the Minister of Energy to state it for the record if Husky has not done that. Same thing with EnCana. They also got a break from this, but they are moving down to the States.

So we are seeing their policy fail. We are seeing job loss. We are seeing investments moving away from our province. We are seeing companies moving away, and because of that, we are seeing this kind of legislation that's even taking money away from seniors. It's cutting their CPI increases, which in some cases is maybe less than $10, so they can pay for their failed policy. This piece of legislation is taking seniors off drug plans, almost 45,000 seniors, so that they can pay for their failed $4.7 billion policy. It's taking money away from housing bodies. It's taking money away from Albertans with disabilities so that they can pay for their failed policies. In short, this piece of legislation is making life difficult for Albertans, and things they are doing with many of the programs are not acceptable to Albertans.

On this International Day of Persons with Disabilities I urge government members to think about Albertans with disabilities and how this piece of legislation will impact them. I know we may hear from them in the rotunda a half-hour from now that they are committed to providing everything to Albertans with disabilities, and at the same time they will come back and vote on this piece of legislation, that is taking benefits away from Albertans with disabilities.

Again, I think I will conclude my remarks by saying that this piece of legislation is just making Albertans pay for this government's failed policies. It's taking money out of the pockets of Albertans, and now Albertans will be paying more to get less.

Not long ago this government, this UCP caucus, wanted Albertans to believe that they were paying 4 to 6 cents on a carbon levy that was killing their livelihood, that was killing their province. Now they have this kind of legislation where their taxes are going up, where their services are cut, where their school funding is cut, where money is taken out of their hospitals, where money is taken away from Albertans with disabilities, where money is taken away from seniors. Like, everybody is paying more just for their failed ideological policies, that have not created a single job.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair and through you to the Member for Calgary-McCall. At the beginning of his close to 20 minutes there he mentioned some tweets that he had put out prior to and during the campaign last spring. I was hoping that he would take that opportunity, because he never has, to apologize to myself and my staff in St. Paul and to an individual that as a result of his irresponsible tweet when he was the Minister of Community and Social Services, where he claimed that the UCP was going to cancel AISH, within hours of that – and I have the e-mail from the perpetrator that apologized and directly correlated his actions to the tweet from the minister. He came out just before midnight and threw two rocks through the window of my constituency office because of an irresponsible tweet from a minister of the province of Alberta.

This is Committee of the Whole, and that member has the opportunity to speak at length as many times as he wants, so maybe if he's going to mention those kinds of tweets that he was talking about, perhaps he'll take advantage of this opportunity to stand up and apologize. He never has. He hasn't apologized to the individual. He has not apologized to my staff for putting them through the stress that he did. An absolutely irresponsible tweet, an untrue tweet, and it continues. We've seen it over the last couple of months, time after time after time, the fearmongering from that side that's causing people unnecessary distress, Madam Chair.

An Hon. Member: You want to talk about stress?

Ms Hoffman: Speak to why you're cutting AISH.

Mr. Sabir: You're cutting AISH.

Mr. Hanson: Yeah. See, they don't like it when you strike a nerve, do they, Madam Chair?

Irresponsible public messaging that causes people unnecessary strife to the point where individuals that are on the edge are pushed to the point – the man in question had never had a criminal record in his life, and now he had charges laid against him. He was very apologetic, but the charges were laid because he'd made an attack on an office and thrown rocks through a window within hours of a tweet by that member when he was a minister. It's embarrassing. He should apologize, and I wish that he would stand up and take this opportunity to apologize. He never has, and I think it's shameful.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 21 this morning. Although I am tempted to respond to some of the comments made by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul, you know, for the sake of maintaining decorum, I won't.

I do want to address the issue of doctor practitioner IDs here, that is present in Bill 21. It was interesting that yesterday, of course, many of us here in the House were meeting with medical students, from both the University of Calgary and the University of Alberta, to hear about their concerns around doctor practitioner ID restrictions. I think it's fair to say that the med students from both the U of A and the U of C are opposed to this idea of restricting doctor practitioner IDs, and they were here to meet with us to tell us that in person. It's a shame, Madam Chair, that a number of colleagues from the opposite side were unable or unwilling to meet with the medical students, from what I understand. But, you know, in my discussions with the medical students, of course, I informed them that that was instructive of who the UCP is really working for. If they're not willing to meet with medical students to talk about this significant issue, it's quite clear that they are not interested in the well-being of medical students and future medical practitioners here in the province.

One of the questions that the medical students asked me was: why is this government going ahead with this idea of restricting doctor practitioner IDs when the evidence is clear that it doesn't work to improve access to health care in rural areas and that it's also been found to be unconstitutional? The answer that I gave them was that this is a government that doesn't actually pay attention to or care about the evidence, nor does it care about losing in court. This is a government that is concerned, really, with only two things, Madam Chair: it's concerned about consolidating its own power, and it's concerned with Americanizing our public health care system. That's what we see here with this move to restrict doctor practitioner IDs for soon-to-graduate students from the University of Alberta and the University of Calgary.

We know that access to rural health care is not, even though that's the stated concern of the members opposite, actually what they're concerned about. We can tell by their actions that they're not concerned about access to rural health care. The medical students that I had the privilege of speaking to yesterday had done internships in rural locations around Alberta and found the experience to be frustrating and demotivating because at the time there were not adequate supports, in their view, for the practice of medicine in those areas. They had limited access to nurses and other health care professionals that they require to be able to provide quality health care to their patients. They didn't have access to the technologies that urban health care professionals have.

The situation has only gotten worse under this regime. We found out last Friday that the government is intent on laying off almost 8,000 public-sector workers, most of whom are going to be in the health care profession. We don't yet know where those positions are going to be eliminated, but with numbers that big, Madam Chair, it's hard to imagine that rural health care won't be on the chopping block.

If the members opposite are genuine in their concern for providing access to rural health care, they wouldn't be moving to cut the number of people who are working in health care in rural areas like they are. That was quite clear to the medical students as well. They understood quite clearly that this government is insincere when it's saying that it's concerned about access to rural health care for the people of Alberta.

They also understood that by restricting practice IDs, it was the thin edge of the wedge to opening up more American-style health care in Alberta. There's nothing limiting a graduate of medical school from hanging up their shingle and operating in private practice. They don't need a practice ID. They can take whoever can afford to pay the bills in to see them. It was quite clear to the medical students, as it is to us here in our caucus, that this move to restrict practice IDs is not about access to rural health care at all. It's about opening the door to American-style health care, where the people who have benefited from the $4.7 billion corporate handout that this government has given will be able to access the finest doctors and the best health care that money can provide. The rest of us are going to be left struggling to get the health care that we need in a system that's being intentionally driven into the ground.

You know, the med students had some helpful suggestions for the government if they are genuine in their concern for increasing access to rural health care for Albertans. One of the things that they indicated was that not only would it be wise to continue to invest in health care professionals, staffing levels, infrastructure, and technologies in rural health care in Alberta but that it would also be wise to increase the number of medical students who are accepted into medical school programs here in Alberta from rural schools.

There are a number of things that need to be done in order to increase rural student access to medical school programs that this government is doing the exact opposite of. You know, rural students, as I've said in debate about this bill before, not only need to be able to afford to pay the tuition to the university that they want to go to, but they also have to be able to afford to find accommodations and be able to afford to feed themselves when they're going to school far away from home.

When this government cuts grants to universities at the scale at which they have and when this government forces universities to raise tuition by 23 per cent over the next four years – when the government cuts grants, that encourages layoffs. We've seen massive layoffs already at the University of Calgary, and there are hundreds and hundreds more to come across the system. We've already seen that the University of Alberta is approving fee hikes for residences and meal plans. That barrier to anybody who wants to go to university is getting ever higher, and the barrier to somebody who has to move away from home, which includes rural Albertans, is getting even higher still.

We're cutting the ability of the University of Alberta and the University of Calgary to deliver a quality program to the most students that they can afford to, and we're also making it harder and harder for rural students who would like to become medical students to even be able to afford to attend school in the first place. How on earth, given that set of circumstances, are we going to realize the potential of bright, ambitious young people living in rural Alberta to attend medical school with barriers that are so high? I would suggest, Madam Speaker, that we won't.

The problem is already severe. Of the medical students that we met with yesterday, I asked if any of them were from rural locations, and none of them were, Madam Speaker. We know that students who have grown up in rural Alberta are more likely to go back and practise in their hometowns or in similar settings once they've completed their studies than kids who have grown up in urban areas because they're familiar with it. They like life in rural Alberta, they want to be close to their friends and family, and they want to contribute back to the communities that have given them so much support. Again, I say that if the government were genuine in its concern about increasing access to rural medical care, it would do the things it needs to do to incent rural students to be able to attend medical school in this province. In fact, the government is doing exactly the opposite.

There is much more that I could say about the way this government is treating doctors in general. All I can say is that when

I had the opportunity to speak to the medical students, I reminded them of the power that medical students and their colleagues who are already practising medicine have to push back against this government's agenda, because doctors have the trust and respect of everybody in Alberta, certainly much more than any of us sitting here in this Chamber. The people of Alberta will believe them when they say that our health care system is under attack, that this government is doing everything it can to Americanize the health care system and make sure that only the wealthy benefit from this system. If they use their power wisely, they can successfully push back against this government's reckless agenda to Americanize our health care system.

I fully expect that medical students and their colleagues practising medicine already will use that power to their full extent to make this government walk back its American health care agenda. I assured the medical students and I will continue to assure every health care professional that I meet that we are with them in this fight and that we won't stop until this agenda to Americanize our health care system is entirely scrapped.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. I am pleased to rise today to speak again in Committee of the Whole with respect to Bill 21 as proposed by the government. I will speak once again to my deep concern with respect to a number of the provisions within this act, but I want to highlight a couple in particular. We've had a lot of the members stand up here today and speak about their advocacy, the concerns that they hear from their constituents. In fact, in all debate in this House we hear members from both sides of the House stand up and speak on behalf of their constituents, which is our most core and fundamental responsibility as representatives for each of the ridings within this Legislature.

I want to share the story of a constituent that I met with just this past Friday, when I was in my constituency office, because it was extremely compelling and moving. The constituent who came into my office is the mother of a severely autistic 18-year-old son, whom she obviously cares very deeply for. In fact, the entire time that we were meeting, she had her phone out, and she apologized, to begin with, by saying, "I apologize for keeping my phone out, but my son is currently with his aide, and in case he needs assistance, I need to always have my phone at the ready." Of course, I said: "That's no problem at all. Of course I completely understand that." What was particularly moving about our meeting and our discussion was that as the mother of a child, now a young adult, with severe disabilities, she of course has spent the full past 18 years as a parent advocating for and caring for her child and planning and probably shaping and creating new plans for how she would care for her child going forward.

Many of us in this Assembly are parents. You know, we raise our kids, and we anticipate the day when they will be independent and be able to live on their own, and we hope for and we invest in that future for them. But for parents of children with severe disabilities, they're planning a different future. They're thinking not just about caring for their child in the immediate and making sure that any barriers to opportunities that they may have are limited but about making sure that they have a fantastic quality of life, all the hopes and aspirations that we all have for our children. But they also have to plan for the fact that their children may never be able to be independent and may never be able to live without the care of medical assistance and therapists and, importantly, a parent.

Of course, the reality is that at some point these severely disabled children will grow up to be adults, and at some point their parents will likely pass on. These parents have an additional burden, which is to think about and plan for a future where they're no longer around to step up and advocate for their children and to think about it in a way that I don't think most parents can even conceive of when they first discover they're going to be having a child. You don't think about that. You don't think about: well, what happens when I'm no longer around? That is a very harsh reality for these families, to be thinking about who's going to care for their adult children when they're no longer there.

That is why Henson trusts were so important and continue to be so important. Those trusts were a way for families to put away money to ensure that when they're no longer around, their adult children are still taken care of. It is a common-sense approach to exempt those trust funds because this is planning for the future. This is planning for a time when there is no family member or parent who's available to provide that support. It is planning for the future, and it is common sense to exempt those funds from the eligibility requirements for young people when they're seeking application to AISH or any other supports because this isn't money that is there because they have wealth or they have a storage of money for disposable income. This money is for planning for a future when there is nobody in their family who is still able to care for them. This is something that we as a system should respect and should support because it is key to families doing the planning for the future so that their children are taken care of but also to plan for a future to lessen the dependency or the need for additional government support and to ensure a standard and basic quality of living for their child, which all of us as parents and Albertans understand is a priority. These families should be commended for being able to do this planning.

I'm proud that this is something that the former government respected and understood, that Henson trusts were something that we needed to put in legislation to protect so that those families knew that their child was not going to be penalized as a result of these funds when seeking basic supports under AISH. It has been said a number of times – I've said it; my colleagues have said it – and we will continue to say that AISH funding is such a bare minimum amount, such a small amount to live on for these individuals that any cut, any reduction in that amount has a significant effect on those individuals. These are the individuals who are severely disabled, who have significant limitations on their ability to work and to earn their own income. It is not a lot of money. As my colleague the Member for St. Albert said, most of us would never have to imagine living on such a small amount of money, but for many Albertans that is the reality.

To be able to plan ahead, for these families to be able to do that and to invest for their children is so important. That is why it is such a disgrace, I believe, for the Henson trust and for money that's put away by these families to be removed from protection under Bill 21 for eligibility requirements for AISH.

What I find most disarming when we've had these conversations in the House is that these omnibus bills were brought forward by the government with a significant amount of details that affected multitudes of pieces of legislation, so many different things are snuck in here. This is only one of many omnibus bills that this government has brought forward in this session, and the idea is that they're hoping these things will get snuck by Albertans, perhaps snuck by the opposition but definitely snuck by Albertans, and that we're not going to catch on.

What I find most disarming is that this was snuck in, yet we've seen that the Minister of Community and Social Services stood up and denied it was the case, which led me to believe that perhaps the minister has not even read this bill. Either she was not aware that this change was brought forward or she truly believes, as this government does, that when you cut the amount of money that people are making and the amount of money they're eligible for, it's not a cut. That is such a bizarre world of cognitive dissonance that we're living in, where we're standing here talking, presenting, and discussing the bills that are brought forward by this government and saying right here that this individual on AISH is now going to get less and that that is a cut, and the government member stands up and says, "That's not a cut," as if repeating it over and over makes it true. We're actually speaking to the provisions of their bill, yet they continue to not actually answer the question and address the issue of why they have cut supports for those most vulnerable Albertans who are on AISH.

We brought it forward in this House and the Member for St. Albert raised it in question period and it has also been brought forward in an amendment to this bill. We've said: look, in this act, Bill 21, you have removed the protections for trust money from the eligibility requirements for Henson trusts. And the Minister of Community and Social Services stood up and said: no, that's not true. But it is right here; on page 17 of Bill 21 it clearly states that "section 3.3 is repealed." Section 3.3 sets out the eligibility requirements for somebody who's seeking AISH. I'm going to quote part of it but not all of it. Section 3.3 specifically states:

The value of all assets of a person and the person's cohabiting partner must not include

- (a) the value of any assets that are held in a trust in which the person or the person's cohabiting partner has a beneficial interest.

That is the provision that states that trust monies must not be included in the eligibility assessment for somebody applying for AISH.

It explicitly says in Bill 21 that that section is repealed, so when we stand up and say, "You are repealing the protections for Henson trusts," and the minister and government members stand up and say, "No, we're not," it makes me wonder if they have a version of Bill 21 that we don't have, that Albertans don't have. You know what? Honestly, I wouldn't be surprised. I wouldn't be surprised if that's the case, because I think that perhaps either the members get talking points that speak to legislation that's different from the one that's tabled in the House or perhaps at this point I would believe anything from this government with respect to what they're trying to sneak by Albertans.

Mr. Schow: Point of order.

The Chair: Hon. member, a point of order has been called.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Siksika.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

Mr. Schow: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise on a point of order under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j). I see the members opposite shaking their heads saying that this is not a point of order. I do believe that, in fact, it is. It is imputing a false motive to this government of trying to sneak things past Albertans.

I recognize that you don't have the benefit of the Blues, Madam Chair, but we need to be very cautious of the things we say in this Chamber.

Ms Pancholi: Oh, yeah. Yeah. Great.

Mr. Schow: That goes, of course, for the member there as well as she's trying to taunt while I'm making a point of order. I just don't quite understand where she sees that going and, really, where she gets the gall to have that lack of decorum in this Chamber. I'd ask her to apologize and retract that comment. This government is not trying to sneak anything past Albertans. Rather, we're trying to make life better for all Albertans.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. This is not a point of order. The comment made is a difference of opinion. On this side of the House we believe that some of the legislation are things that the government may be trying to put past Albertans. This was not a comment directed at an individual member, and therefore it does not fall under 23(h), (i), and (j). It is not a point of order; it's a difference of opinion.

The Chair: Hon. members, as we near this Christmas break, when we will be reintroduced to our constituents, I would suggest that we focus on that and not language that may inflame others.

This is not a point of order, but I will express some caution to the hon. member as she proceeds with the rest of her time.

Debate Continued

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Chair. As I was saying, I believe that it's important that the government is forthcoming and honest with Albertans about what's contained in their bills.

In section 3.3, which is repealed, is the protection for Henson trusts. When the Minister of Community and Social Services says that this is not being repealed, that is actually contrary to what is in Bill 21. I'm here to speak on behalf of my constituent, who is representative of a number of constituents and is probably representative of constituents from across this province and across the Assembly, who was in tears in my office because she believed that she had been doing what was right and best for her child for the past 18 years by putting away money in trust and believed that it was the only assurances that she had going forward that her adult child would be cared for and would not be penalized when seeking supports from this government, from AISH. She was counting on that. It gave her peace of mind to know that her child would be cared for to some degree in her absence.

For the Minister of Community and Social Services to stand up and say that that is not happening when Bill 21 clearly repeals that – I invite the Minister of Community and Social Services to then make it clear and to propose her own amendment to Bill 21 to correct that. Actually, the Member for St. Albert did that. She proposed a clear amendment to Bill 21 to clarify, apparently in accordance with what the Minister of Community and Social Services is saying, that Henson trusts are protected. That was an amendment that was brought forward by the Member for St. Albert. The government members voted against it, and it was voted down.

I simply have to ask on behalf of my constituent: if there is a clear commitment from this government to protect Henson trusts, to protect severely disabled Albertans, to protect their families, who are seeking to protect them going forward, then bring forward your own amendment to correct the mistake, I assume, that was made in this bill because as of right now this bill repeals those protections.

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but according to Standing Order 4(3), we will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 21.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, say no. So carried.
The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you. I move to adjourn the Assembly until this afternoon at 1:30.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:56 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, December 3, 2019

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good afternoon, hon. members. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, it is a privilege to welcome back some familiar faces to this Chamber, members of the Alberta Association of Former MLAs. Please rise as I call your name: Shiraz Shariff, Karen Leibovici, Ed Gibbons, David Coutts, and Heather Klimchuk. Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we have two school groups visiting us today: from the constituency of Edmonton-McClung welcome students from Callingwood elementary, and from the constituency of St. Albert welcome students from Joseph M. Demko school.

Now, hon. members, as you may know, the Speaker hosted the International Day of Persons with Disabilities ceremony in the rotunda today, and I am so pleased to welcome two recipients of the 2019 Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities award: Ms Donna Desjardins and Mr. Joseph Sask. Please rise. Congratulations. I'd also like to welcome the chair of the council, Mr. Neil Pierce, and Stella Varvis, chair of family support for children with disabilities, Provincial Parent Advisory Committee. Thank you for coming.

Hon. members, we have guests of the Minister of Seniors and Housing: John and Lyle Hallet. Also, visiting the Minister of Health this afternoon are guests from the University of Alberta's master of nursing program. Visiting the Minister of Transportation is his constituency assistant from Calgary-Hays, Tyler Van Vliet, and his partner, Zoe Szeremet, visiting us from Australia. Welcome, and thank you, Tyler, for all you do. Guests, please rise and receive the welcome of this Assembly.

Ministerial Statements

The Deputy Speaker: The Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions.

Mental Health and Suicide Prevention

Mr. Luan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I rise to speak in light of the tragic event that occurred yesterday on the steps of the Legislature. Suicide is a reality that far too many Albertans and Canadians are familiar with. Let's be honest with each other. Suicide is not an easy thing to talk about. It's a heartbreaking reality that we must confront all together, and yesterday's event has once again brought the tragedy of suicide into the spotlight.

Every day in Alberta one or more people may die of suicide and more may attempt suicide, not to mention the countless others who experience depression and other forms of mental illness that can lead to suicide. The difficult reality is that each life lost to suicide leaves a ripple effect across the lives of those who live on – the family, the friends, the loved ones – who are left with broken pieces of their lives, unable to make sense of this tremendous loss. It's a loss that too many people know. I want to remind everyone experiencing those challenges that there are services available 24/7 and that you are not alone. You are loved, you are valuable, you are strong, and you are worth it.

Over the past years there has been tremendous work done to reduce the stigma that relates to suicide and mental health challenges to help those who are suffering to find help and to bring those who are struggling out of the darkness and into the light. We have awareness days, public health campaigns, and many passionate citizens who dedicate their lives to work with others to get people well.

But, with that, sometimes we forget that there are many small things we can all do to make a difference. We can ask someone how they are doing. We can show someone that we care. We can take the time out of our busy lives to ensure that the people we love know that they are loved and that our loved ones know that we will be there for them every step along the way.

We must all work together to talk openly about depression, mental health challenges, and suicide. These challenges are all too often silent until a tragedy makes them painfully visible. Everyone needs to know that help is always available and that asking for help is a sign of strength. There are resources available to everyone in this province 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year.

It shows strength to ask for help. It shows strength to take a hand. It shows strength to share your experience. To help somebody else is very well worth it. If you or someone you know needs help, you can call Health Link at 811 or the mental health helpline at 1.877.303.2642, or if you're in a crisis, simply call 911, because you are worth it.

I know that we must continue to talk in an open and honest way about these difficult issues. At the end of the day, we're all Albertans, and we want each other to be happy, healthy, and resilient.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As all Albertans, we want to take care of each other, to be a shoulder to lean on at times when things are tough. Yesterday we lost a friend, a family member, an Albertan to suicide. Even though we may not know his name, we know of the common struggles he faced – the feeling of isolation, unloved, unwanted, struggling with perceived failures – moments that all of us can relate to.

We all have days where we just don't feel like we belong in the world that we live in. As the day-to-day stressors build up, some of us don't know what to do, who to talk to, or even if we should. Many have been raised not to talk about their feelings, to man up, go to work, and just do what needs to be done. We know better. We know that as people we need to be heard, to feel valued, to know that even in moments of being vulnerable, it is okay, and the days will get better.

We must take real steps to address the mental health crisis in the province. By working together, across all party lines, we can continue to build on the resources and supports that people need. We must continue to expand supports for children and youth so that we can address their mental health needs as early as possible and continue to recognize that as our world continues to become more complex, adults also can get the resources that they need. We all know in this House that there is much more to do.

For those that are in need of support today, please reach out. If you feel that you can't speak to a friend or a family member, then call the mental health line at 1.877.303.2642. It's there 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

We have a responsibility to each other in this House and in the province to take the time to listen, to talk to one another, to recognize that at different moments and at times we all need to be loved. So take that time. Slow down the business of the day and take a minute, a minute to take care of yourself, to breathe, and to enjoy the minutes and the moments that can quickly pass us by.

Value who you are, the gift that you give to others around you in just being you. Value those around you, the ones that bring meaning to your life. Tell them that you love them, that they are important. Take the risk of being vulnerable, and show your true feelings to those who are around you. Take the time, that small moment of compassion, that moment of telling someone you love them. A quick hug can make all the difference to a person who just needs that moment. All we really have in the world is time: time to love, time to be loved, and time to enjoy the gifts that each day gives us. So tell the people around you that you love them.

For those who are listening, for those who feel alone, you are valued, you are special, you are loved, and you deserve to live.

Thank you.

Members' Statements

International Day of Persons with Disabilities

Ms Renaud: I'm grateful to the United Nations for declaring this day in 1992 the International Day of Persons with Disabilities. The 2019 theme is Promoting the Participation of Persons with Disabilities and Their Leadership. Celebrating publicly is important, but more important is to measure our progress and to set goals so that we can measure that progress and that our progress is from one year to the next, that it's not marked by election cycles or board appointments. It needs to be like a relay race, where we hand off to each other.

We need to have continuous monitoring on really important issues like poverty reduction. We need to support Albertans with disabilities as they look for employment. Graduates don't find work. Chronic unemployment is a problem. Underemployment is a problem. Participation in postsecondary education is dismal. We need to properly fund education so that parents and families are not having to advocate for this every year. We need to have a place where seclusion rooms don't replace adequately funded classrooms. We need health care that is accessible, complex care that is accessible. We need to address domestic violence and prevent abuse and neglect because that is a chronic problem in this community.

We need to do like the federal government has done and introduce legislation also. Bill C-81, the Accessible Canada Act, received royal assent in June 2019, and it requires that the federally regulated private sector, government of Canada Crown corporations, and Parliament do everything they can to address accessibility. But the most important job that we have is to create inclusion, real inclusion, and that requires commitment, dedication, and action every single day. There are 6.2 million Canadians the age of 15 and over that identify as having a disability.

We have a lot of work to do. I hope that we celebrate today, but I hope that next year's celebration marks a summary of the work that we've done together to take the UN's pledge to leave no one behind.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

British Columbia Energy Policies

Mr. Milliken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The B.C. NDP government is working to block Alberta energy from reaching global markets. For example, the B.C. government's lawsuits and judicial harassment of the Energy East pipeline and the Trans Mountain pipeline killed the first and threatens the second. Take also, for example, Alberta's liquefied natural gas. On the one hand, B.C.'s NDP are doing everything they can to stop us from developing our LNG. On the other hand, B.C. is building several LNG projects, including the largest private-sector LNG project in Canadian history. This double-dealing clearly reeks of hypocrisy. To the B.C. government I say: how dare you wilfully support and develop your LNG projects but at the same time try to stop us.

Not only that, but B.C. is actively working against climate change. B.C. is Canada's largest coal producer. They demand that we all reduce GHGs but at the same time export millions of tonnes of coal to China. China is the world's worst polluter and the largest coal consumer. Not only do they have 15 coal plants, but they are building eight more on Chinese soil and another 300 across the world. I guess that with all the Chinese coal money they make, it is no wonder that B.C. looks right past their pretend climate change goals. No wonder Vancouver is the largest coal port in North America. No wonder they are denying First Nations along TMX the prosperity they are asking for. No wonder they turn a blind eye to the lack of Chinese regulations, employment standards, their poor environmental stewardship, and, of course, their dismal human rights record.

The B.C. NDP are the new coal barons, and they've sold out their environmental morals in the name of Chinese dollar signs. The action of the B.C. government directly conflicts with their environmental grandstanding. They are acting only in their own financial best interests and not in the interests of Albertans and the rest of Canada.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Civil Society and Government Programs

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Albertans do not like big government. We do like civil society, though, with Albertans' average donations to registered charities the highest in Canada. Government should foster, not seek to supplant, civil society. Here's an example. The Mustard Seed is a registered charity, with services in Red Deer. They have a lunch program, delivering school lunches to children in need. This service, supported by community donations and volunteers, cost little and worked well. Then along came the NDP, who displaced this service with a big-government lunch program. Instead of free volunteers, big-government employees. Instead of lunches based on need, free lunches to entire schools regardless of needs. The Mustard Seed's approach was clearly better, yet the NDP sought to use the rough fist of the state to supplant the gentle hand of civil society.

Madam Speaker, Albertans yearn for change in government culture. What can government learn from civil society? In civil society love is the motivating force, not a paycheck. Motivated in love, civil society seeks to go the extra mile to serve the one. Mediocrity and bare minimums are incompatible where there is an overarching desire to serve others in love. Let all who work in government seek to instead serve in government and, by following the example of civil society, ennoble that service by serving in love in seeking the public interest. This makes us better in our stewardships.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Urban Indigenous Program Funding

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. On Sunday the Premier reported to media that the cuts now being made are not like the cuts made by then Premier Klein because, whereas the Klein cuts were across the board, these cuts were targeted. So the question we now need to ask is: who is being targeted? The answer is clear: the indigenous community and, more specifically, the urban indigenous community. While the Premier talks about the cuts amounting to 2.8 per cent, the truth is that the cuts to the urban indigenous programming are 100 per cent, and they're across Alberta.

In estimates I asked for a list of the programs to be cut, and the minister was unable to answer me, which is quite telling. Fortunately, I was able to receive a list in writing. When it arrived, I was astounded to learn who was being targeted: the native friendship centres, Bent Arrow Traditional Healing Society, the Institute for the Advancement of Aboriginal Women, the Grande Prairie Friendship Centre, Metis Calgary Family Services, Native Counselling, the Red Deer Urban Aboriginal Voices Society, and the Urban Society for Aboriginal Youth in Calgary.

Let's talk about what the programs do for indigenous people. They assist families leaving reserves and transitioning to urban centres. They support youth leaving high school to begin postsecondary. They guide women leaving prison to integrate into society. They help women involved with child welfare services to re-establish their homes and resume parenting their children. It is clear that this government is unwilling to assist indigenous people who hope to improve their lives. Isn't that a statement? What this government fails to understand are the consequences of destroying relationships that have been built over years. They cannot simply shut down these programs in hopes that others will be available in time. When people are in the process of making transitions, they often have approach-avoidance behaviours, which means that they enter the programs and exit them a number of times. It's critical that the personnel remain the same so that there are welcome, known faces there for people who recommit themselves to change.

Minister, tears are not enough. It is time for you to find some nerve to resist these assaults.

Teacher and Teacher Aide Positions

Mr. Long: Madam Speaker, I rise today concerned. I'm concerned because school boards across Alberta are threatening to cut teachers and teachers' aides. I've spent time in classrooms across my riding and know that those students deserve the resources necessary to achieve a high-quality education. The teachers in my constituency are incredible people. They work hard. They go above and beyond because they care so deeply about their students. I trust that all teachers do. What concerns me is that while there are many school boards across the province, including those in my riding, who are prioritizing children's education, some are choosing to politicize teachers and the education of our students in an attempt to negotiate with our government. Many of my constituents are confused when they see other school boards making these irresponsible decisions. Why would a school board fire teachers when they can make cuts elsewhere?

My constituents understand that our province is in debt, and they understand that we need to be responsible while paying off this debt so we can get Alberta back on track.

Albertans also understand that this is a transition period and that a new funding model, currently under development, will help to relieve some of these tensions going forward and into the future.

What confuses them, Madam Speaker, is that school boards are threatening to lay off teachers before they're willing to make any other concessions. It is especially confusing when the government has told them that they expect boards to prioritize the classroom. These boards have reserves. They have savings which they can draw on to help fill gaps where those gaps may exist, and it absolutely baffles me that boards would choose to cut teachers before using these. I see no reason for school boards to be cutting staff when they could make cuts elsewhere or draw on their reserves.

Madam Speaker, I rise today to thank all the school boards who are putting in tremendous efforts to provide the best possible education for our children and still protecting teachers' jobs during this transition year as our government begins to clean up the fiscal mess left by the previous government.

I also want to commend all the teachers who show up every day no matter what and who show so much care for the next generation.

Oral Question Period

The Deputy Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Health Care System

Ms Notley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's good to see the Premier again, and I'm hoping he can help explain a few things to his House leader. Yesterday the House leader tried to deny that this government has ordered mass layoffs of front-line health care workers. That's only one business day after this government sent letters to those workers announcing that thousands of them would be sacked. Perhaps the Premier can do better. Albertans read the UCP platform, and Albertans have read the letters. Why is this Premier breaking his fundamental promise to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: I'm not, and the government is not, Madam Speaker. The United Conservative Party committed to maintain or increase health care funding. Last year health care funding was $20,409,000,000. Under this budget it's $20,610,000,000. Next year it'll be $20,616,000,000, going up to $20,672,000,000 in the fiscal year 2022-2023. Those are increases, not cuts.

Ms Notley: Well, he also promised to protect front-line services, and on Friday at least 5,000 people heard that they were going to lose their jobs.

Now, the Health minister is also displaying the utter contempt for the facts that has become a bit of a hallmark of this government. Yesterday he told media, quote: none of these reductions represent any service cuts at all. Now, Madam Speaker, AHS is laying off thousands of front-line workers, and the letter speaks openly about "reducing or ceasing the provision of services." To the Premier: is his government's refusal to acknowledge what they're doing a function of embarrassment, incompetence, or institutionalized gaslighting?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, the government is not laying off thousands of people, and the Leader of the Opposition is irresponsibly trying to create fear for people's job security. In fact, the government has indicated the maximum number of positions that could be affected by changes over the next four years. We would hope that there would be significantly fewer positions affected and that those that are affected would be affected by not replacing people as they retire or leave the workforce. We've always been clear about seeking to maximize changes through attrition rather than layoffs. Even if that number were to be real, we'd still represent the highest per capita number of nurses in Canada.

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, I would suggest the Premier read the letter a little bit more closely because it doesn't say what he just suggested it did. It does say, however, that they will be looking at closing acute-care beds as continuing care beds open and patients are moved over. Albertans have seen the letter, so think closely. Now, that's about 1 in 5 beds, and while we have no argument at all with getting patients into the right care, those acute beds are still needed to reduce surgical wait times. Will the Premier admit that closing beds is part of his plan to create more private care for the very wealthiest while the rest of us wait even longer?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I will remind the hon. leader of the NDP that during her tenure as Premier hospital wait times for most procedures increased even though the government increased their health budget by 15 per cent, and this is the problem. We have by far the most expensive health system in Canada, but we have higher than average infant mortality and lower than average life expectancy and generally above average hospital wait times while on an age-adjusted basis we spend 30 per cent more per capita than the average amongst Canadian provinces. We call upon the unions to work with us in finding more efficient ways of delivering quality health care to ensure that universal care is there for all in the future.

The Deputy Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Closing health care beds isn't going to fix any of that, Madam Speaker.

Now, one of the longest running debates in the United States is how to fix their health care system. Democrats and Republicans don't agree on much, but they agree that their system is broken. In Alberta we've taken a different path with medicare and with the Canada Health Act. But at the Premier's own UCP convention his party rejected a motion calling for him to comply with the principles of the Canada Health Act. To the Premier. You promised to protect public health care. Now your party is attacking it. Why should Albertans trust you at all?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, we are of course maintaining universal – you know, the question is so utterly ridiculous because it's the same NDP medi-scare that we've heard every year for decades in this House and in every other Legislature across Canada. When the NDP is desperate, they roll out the old medi-scare card. But with respect to the letter to which she refers, this is a requirement of the collective bargaining process to indicate the total number of positions that could be affected, not that are being affected. She's trying to scare nurses, suggesting that hundreds of people are being laid off when that is simply not true. It's irresponsible.

Ms Notley: I am strangely surprised that the Premier did not refer to the decision of his UCP party as medi-scare at their actual convention. But, you know, I guess it all depends on the audience, Madam Speaker.

Now, our plan for lab services was based on the Health Quality Council saying that it was the best value. Now it's being sold off. We improved ambulance turnaround times in hospitals with a program this Premier cancelled, and now they're threatening to sell that off, too. Over the weekend the Premier's party called for still more privately delivered health care. Why did the Premier hide his real plan for health care from Albertans during the election campaign?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, under the NDP much of our health care was delivered by private providers, by physician contractors, by private medical clinics, by day surgeries done by nongovernment-operated hospitals, all within the context of our universally accessible and insured system. That's how the health care system operates in Canada. We need to challenge all of our partners to help to do that more efficiently, including NDP-affiliated unions that are asking for one-year pay increases of as much as 8 per cent. Taxpayers can't afford that.

Ms Notley: What taxpayers can afford, actually, is a Premier who would negotiate in good faith and not in the public. Nonetheless, Albertans also voted to protect health care and respect the Canada Health Act. They're getting something very different and very dangerous, and they deserve to see the real plan. Yesterday his caucus voted down our request for an emergency debate, so I challenge the Premier to debate the future of health care with me instead, live. He should tell Albertans about why he thinks American-style health care is the best. He should have the courage of his convictions and be accountable instead of hiding from the debate. To the Premier: will he do that?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, this is a debate right now, and Albertans had a debate in the spring on the NDP's record on spending more for less on health care, on spending more than any other province and getting less, on spending more and wait times going up. Now she talks about negotiating in public. It's her affiliated unions, that are actually literal constitutional legal affiliates of the NDP, that are asking taxpayers to pay 8 per cent more in salaries per year when the average private-sector family's after-tax income is down by 8 per cent over the past five years. The NDP could not be more out of touch.

The Deputy Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition for her third set of questions.

Investment in Alberta

Ms Notley: Albertans deserve more than 35-second clips, especially when they are filled with as many inaccuracies as we just saw right there.

Nonetheless, yesterday Husky Energy revealed to its investors what this government didn't have the courage to report to this House, that 370 Alberta workers lost their jobs this fall. What's even more, though, is that Husky is cutting overall spending by half a billion dollars, but they'll still find money to upgrade a refinery in Wisconsin, all this while they pocketed a quarter-billion-dollar corporate handout from this Premier. Why won't this Premier admit he's creating jobs in Wisconsin with Alberta's tax dollars while Albertans themselves get fired?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, Husky was very clear that it's because of curtailment that they're making these reductions, curtailment imposed by the previous government because they allied themselves with the Trudeau Liberals, who killed the Northern Gateway pipeline, killed Energy East. By the way, let's not forget that the NDP was opposed to Northern Gateway. They were opposed to Keystone XL. They did nothing to ensure the construction of Energy East, unlike this government. With the opening of Enbridge's line 3, the Canadian portion, pipeline optimization, and special production allowances on rail, it would mean several hundred thousand additional barrels of Alberta crude being shipped in the next year.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I was very pleased, actually, to be at the announcement of line 3's beginning of construction, but investors are backing away from Alberta because of the uncertainty that this Premier is actually creating. He's cancelled successful tax credits, he's threatened Albertans' pensions, and he's cynically fanning the flames of separatism for his own political ends. The CEO of Calgary Economic Development reported last Friday that Alberta missed out on a tech firm that employs a thousand people because of these very actions. Why is this Premier driving investment away with his failed economic policies and irresponsible rhetoric?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, that is so ridiculous. I'm so pleased to have the opportunity to tell the House about the success Alberta had in winning the support of all 13 provinces and territories yesterday, support for the construction of pipelines, for global market access for our energy, for demanding that the federal government rewrite the no more pipelines law, Bill C-69, and for a fair deal on the fiscal stabilization program and equalization payback to Alberta. Unlike the NDP, we've got every province and territory standing with Alberta on key aspects of our fair-deal plan.

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, last week a survey of Alberta small businesses showed yet another steep drop in business confidence. In fact, it's the fifth month in a row that small-business confidence has dropped in Alberta. Almost a third expect layoffs in the next 90 days. We're down more than 10,000 jobs since this government was elected. When will this Premier stop whining about how it's everyone else's fault, take responsibility for the problems he has created, and do whatever it takes to get Albertans back to work? [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Order. Order.
The hon. Premier.

Mr. Kenney: Well, Madam Speaker, that display is exactly why the NDP was the first government in Alberta history to be fired by Albertans after one term: anger and tax hikes, a reckless fiscal policy. They raised taxes on businesses, on property, on everything through the carbon tax, on incomes. Revenues went down from almost every one of those sources, and tens of billions of dollars of capital fled the province and, together with it, jobs. This government is acting with lightning speed to do everything possible to bring job-creating investment back to Alberta.

Education Funding

Ms Hoffman: To the Premier. Day in and day out the Education minister has repeated tired talking points, saying that she is maintaining education funding, but now we have learned that she has told some boards to use their limited money they have for building maintenance as a last-ditch effort to lay off fewer teachers. Why? Because she's cutting education funding, plain and simple. Nobody is happy with this budget performance. Does the Premier really think it's okay to put an unsafe roof over an oversized classroom?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, incessantly restating a mistruth doesn't make it any truer. Page 88 of the budget, Ministry of Education operating expense: last year, $8.223 billion; this year, $8.223 billion; next year, $8.223 billion; and so on. We have the second most expensive education system in Canada on a per capita basis.

This is not a reduction in spending. Would the NDP please stop trying to mislead Albertans? [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, heckling is not yelling across the aisle.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: The Premier lives in Calgary. Calgary public has $32 million less than they had last year, Premier. It's plain and simple. It's math. It's black and white. Please stop denying the facts. The minister is now telling school boards to choose between safe plumbing or teachers. On this side of the House we believe that kids deserve safe classrooms, a toilet that flushes, and a teacher who's there to support them. It's clear that the minister doesn't share those values. To the Premier: do you really think it's okay to have toilets overflowing and overcrowded classrooms, and if you don't, why won't you amend your budget to fund education properly, as you say you're doing but clearly aren't?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows that what she is saying is, to be generous, inaccurate. She knows that the budget passed by this Legislature ascribes $8.223 billion to education this year and next year, the largest expenditure on education in the history of Alberta, the second-highest expenditure on education per capita in the entire country. If her friends . . .

Ms Notley: Twenty thousand more kids this year. Twenty thousand more kids alone . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Sorry. I thought we addressed the yelling issue earlier, hon. leader.

Hon. Premier, please continue.

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, for the folks at home who heard somebody shouting, that was the Leader of the Opposition showing no respect for this institution.

If she's really concerned about these issues, perhaps she could speak to her friends in the school boards about ensuring that this stable budget is reflected in their decisions.

Ms Hoffman: Perhaps the Premier should talk to his friend the Education minister about the realities facing schools: $32 million cut from the Calgary board of education, Madam Speaker. How can the Premier deny facts? I know he's got a nice big rolled-up budget, but the reality on the ground is different: $32 million cut from Calgary public, 300 teachers laid off. The minister knows it. That's why she's telling them to divert money from buildings that are rotting to prevent more layoffs. Why won't the Premier admit the facts, stand in this place, and take responsibility for his atrocious budget?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, again, the budget for education is being maintained. We are maintaining our commitment to Albertans in that respect. We spend the largest amount of money in the history of the province on education even in the midst of a fiscal crisis, a fiscal crisis created by the NDP. Of course, based on enrolment numbers and a number of other criteria in the formula, largely established by the previous government, there will be from year to year adjustments in different school boards, but in the case of the Calgary board of education, with a $1.2 billion budget and a large reserve, the question is: why was their first resort to lay off teachers? It wasn't the right choice.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I proudly ran as a candidate for this party because, as our platform clearly stated with our public health guarantee, a UCP government would “maintain or increase health spending and maintain a universally accessible, publicly funded health care system.” This pledge is important to me and all members on this side of the House, and it shows an importance to priority in challenging fiscal times. To the Minister of Health. Please give an update to me and this House. Is this government following through on its promise?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The answer is yes. As the member indicates and reminds the House, we campaigned on maintaining or increasing health care spending. That’s exactly what we’re doing in Budget 2019. Let me be clear to the members opposite that nothing in the mandatory disclosure that was provided to our unions last week indicates any cutting of services, any cutting of access to health care services. Absolutely, we are delivering on our health care guarantee. We’ve given the unions the mandatory disclosures that were required to be provided to them. These indicate modest, potential reductions, causing people to overreact, like the members opposite are acting right now. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, members of the Official Opposition were given quiet time and respectful time to ask their question. I would ask that you would honour that to members of the government as well when they are asking their questions.

The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that at the end of last week AHS announced that they will be reducing staff by nearly 500 full-time positions over three years through attrition and given that this represents approximately 1 per cent of total AHS registered nurses over three years, which is significantly less than the yearly employment turnover, to the Minister of Health: are you cutting nursing positions, or will they be reallocated elsewhere?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. AHS has informed the unions of potential modest reductions, including a reduction in RN positions of under 1 per cent per year over the next three years, as the member indicated. This is less than normal turnover. I would also note that we currently have about 3 per cent more RNs per capita than the national average, so the total potential reduction would still leave us around the national average. We’re giving our unions the best information available so that we can negotiate with them in good faith. Any reductions would be through attrition as much as possible. Three-quarters, I would note, of all the potential changes in health care staff are due to a change of employer, not through reductions of jobs overall in the province.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that yesterday the opposition leader suggested that rural ridings with new continuing care facilities ought to brace themselves for a reduction in front-line services elsewhere and given that the purpose of additional continuing care facilities is to reduce the burden on hospitals in providing long-term care and given that rural areas already feel a deficit in care providers compared to the cities, to the Minister of Health: can rural areas expect equivalent services in addition to the opening of continuing care facilities?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Yes, they certainly can. We need to increase the overall capacity of the system. That means adding continuing care across the province, especially in many of our smaller urbans, where the unmet need is mainly for continuing care. We recognize that there are unique challenges to delivering rural health care. The 2019 budget for the Health ministry puts patients first regardless of where they live. We need to do things differently, and, yes, that will mean some changes in how services are delivered. It’s a dynamic system, always changing so that we can always dynamically meet the care of Albertans throughout the province, but it will not mean reductions in access.

Calgary Finances

Member Ceci: Madam Speaker, up to 216 Calgarians will lose their jobs at the city of Calgary next year due to provincial funding cuts. These city workers will join 300 teachers losing their jobs at Calgary public schools, 250 staff losing their jobs at the University of Calgary, 300 warehouse workers losing their jobs at Federated Co-ops, hundreds more at Lowe’s Canada, and now thousands more Calgarians will be losing their jobs in public health care and ancillary support. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: why does your government care so little about working Calgarians?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Let me be clear. In budget 2019-2020 we maintained 100 per cent in MSI funding to all of our municipalities. I think that the question that that Member for Calgary-Buffalo ought to ask himself is: how did we get there? We got here as a consequence of their four years of disastrous policies. That’s how we got here. We are now cleaning up the mess that they created. They caused so much fear in our economy that it led investors to leave our province, taking hundred of billions of dollars in investment away from our province.

Member Ceci: Yet city workers will lose their jobs.

Given that the people earning those paycheques would have spent money in local businesses on food and other necessities and benefited the Calgary economy and given that those paycheques were all cancelled so the Premier could give $4.7 billion in handouts to corporations that are now spending that money in other provinces and in the United States, my question is: how many jobs has this minister created in Wisconsin by forcing hundreds and hundreds of layoffs in Calgary?

Mr. Madu: Madam Speaker, unlike the previous government, that left more than 200,000 of our fellow citizens out of work, as a consequence of the changes that we are now beginning to implement in order to clean up their mess, in October alone we added 23,000 private-sector jobs, unlike when they were in government. You know, the public service bloated, and that led to the flight of investments away from our province. We are cleaning up their mess, and we will not be lectured by them.

Member Ceci: Given that even with a frozen city budget Calgarians are paying more property taxes to backfill provincial cuts and given that this includes a property tax increase just to keep the existing police officers on the street after the Minister of Justice raided their fines revenue, why is this government forcing Calgary property owners to subsidize job creation in Newfoundland while their friends, neighbours, and family in Calgary are laid off by the thousands?

Mr. Madu: Madam Speaker, this side of the House is responsible for the provincial government, and the city councils across this province, like that of Calgary, are responsible for their own budget. We provided the police grant to municipalities. That grant was maintained at 100 per cent. Again, the question those members over there ought to ask themselves is: in the four years that they were in office, what did they do? We know the answer: more than $60 billion in debt. That is their record.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Seniors' Driver Medical Examination Fees

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This government continues its full-fledged attack on Alberta seniors. They have kicked people off the seniors' drug plan. They have cut into rental and housing assistance for funding, and now they're planning to deinsure drivers' medical exams, the very exams that seniors are required to take so they can continue to drive their vehicles. Just shameful. To the minister of seniors: why are you making life more expensive for seniors on every front while cutting a $4.7 billion cheque to big corporations?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Once again I will just remind the opposition member that our Budget 2019 includes an increase of $9 million for social and seniors' services and makes sure that Alberta's growing seniors population is well supported.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, given that the population of seniors is growing at 23 per cent annually, of course they need to increase the budget. But individuals are getting less – it's easy to understand that – and given that seniors are required to pass this driver's medical exam at 75, again at age 80, and every two years after that and given that fees listed online suggest that these drivers' medical exams cost in the neighbourhood of $80, to the minister: please inform Alberta seniors of just how you expect them to pay for your constant barrage of added costs being downloaded onto their already very tight budget.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Pon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Our government must get its spending under control. Seniors have made our province what it is today, but they also understand that we have to control our budget. It's not like the opposition members, who spent money like crazy. We are cleaning up their mess. The MacKinnon report indicated that if we continued down this path of spending, we would soon be more than $100 billion in debt. We are spending $5 million a day on interest instead of $5 million a day to buy . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, given that the government is balancing their budget on the backs of seniors and given that cutting insurance for drivers' medical exams is expected to save the government about $4 million and given that that represents less than one-one-thousandth of a fraction of the $4.7 billion giveaway to big corporations and given that that handout isn't creating jobs but that cutting insurance for seniors and will have harmful impacts on our seniors here in Alberta, to the minister: will you stand up for Alberta seniors, do the right thing, and immediately restore insurance for drivers' medical exams?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just to correct the record, our job-creation tax cut is actually only affecting government revenues this year by $100 million, nothing close to the number the members opposite are saying.

Albertans elected this government to find efficiencies, to ensure that we deliver programs in the most cost-effective way . . . [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members. [interjections] Hon. Member for St. Albert, please stop yelling.

Hon. Minister of Finance, you have 35 seconds.

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, again, Albertans elected this government to manage this province's finances responsibly and clean up the mess the members opposite have left us. We will deliver.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Children's Services Programs

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Spruce Grove Parent Link Centre in my riding provides parenting supports in a judgment-free environment to give extra help to any parents that need it as well as opportunities for parents to connect with other parents who have children of similar ages. Some of my constituents have inquired about the status of these opportunities as a result of the upcoming expression of interest for early intervention and prevention grants. Can the Minister of Children's Services assure my constituents that programs similar to these will continue to be delivered?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The short answer to that question is: absolutely. This is about providing services where they have the greatest impact and building on partnerships that are already happening between agencies and communities across the province. What we won't do is continue to do things the way we've always done them because we've always done them that way. [interjections] Over the next six months this transparent process will allow community partners to propose the best approaches on how we can strengthen the prevention and early intervention system and serve children and families across the province.

Mr. Loewen: Point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Madam Speaker and to the Minister of Children's Services for her answer. Given the demand for these services in my riding and given that our government has committed to continuing to fund programs for the most vulnerable children and families in our communities, as was seen by the increase in funding for Children's Services, and given that constituents in my riding are worried about whether funding for these kinds of programs will continue, can the minister elaborate on why she made the decision to consolidate these kinds of programs?

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, a point of order has been noted at 2:21. Two points of order have been noted at 2:21.

Ms Schulz: Madam Speaker, children deserve to be safe, supported, and get a good start in life no matter where they live in our province. For too long there has been a patchwork approach to services that is difficult for vulnerable families to navigate. The new system needs to be more consistent across the province. It needs to reflect unique community needs. It needs to address the gap in services that sometimes exists for children past the age of six years old, and it needs to focus on implementing the precedent-setting well-being and resiliency framework introduced this spring. Many community organizations are already doing this, and government needs to catch up.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain.

Mr. Turton: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that I've heard from many stakeholders and constituents in my riding regarding this process, in particular from those who use the Spruce Grove Parent Link Centre, can the Minister of Children's Services please share with this House some of the feedback that she has received over the last few weeks on this initiative?

Ms Schulz: Madam Speaker, I know there are colleagues, likely on all sides of this House, who have heard a great deal of feedback on this new plan. I do understand that change can bring uncertainty, but certainly we've also heard positive feedback from partners across Alberta. In Edmonton we heard, quote: it's the first time in my career in Alberta in 15 years that I've seen a revisioning of our sector, and quite frankly it's long overdue. End quote. In Vegreville we heard: "The Province's updates to the Parent Link Program could allow us to improve and build upon existing services. Change isn't always easy. I commend the province."

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Health Care Professional Positions

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In recent days my office has been flooded with e-mails, phone calls, messages of grave concern from health care workers and physicians and everyday Albertans about how devastating the health care cuts being carried out by this government are and how they will affect them, and I have no doubt that the members opposite have been receiving them, too. Indeed, we saw this government standing today in question period to attempt to spin this away as they fire 5,000 health care workers and counting. As they jeopardize their jobs, it's not going to help patient care. To this minister: what will happen when these beds are closed because RNs aren't there to staff them?

Mr. Shandro: Madam Speaker, spending more than the NDP government ever did on health care is not a cut. We promised Albertans when we campaigned in the last election that we would maintain or increase health care spending. That's exactly what we did in Budget 2019. That's what we're going to continue to do in future years as well. We'll continue to work with Albertans and make sure that we're going to have our spending be patient focused. We're going to work with both the Alberta Medical Association, our physicians, and our unions to make sure that our spending is in the best interests of our patients in this province.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Now, given that this UCP government's style of consultation is, apparently, to act first, ignore questions later, we asked Alberta doctors how this government's proposed changes to compensation to physicians would affect them and their patients, and given that the doctors we spoke to said that they feel scared, disillusioned, angry, and undervalued and given that patients will be forced to higher cost areas of the health care system such as ERs and admissions to hospital, to this Minister of Health: is the chaos you're creating in our health care system worth your $4.7 billion gift to big corporations?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As I said yesterday, we started meeting with the Alberta Medical Association on November 13. We provided them the next day with our proposal. We're looking forward to getting a proposal back from the AMA, the Alberta Medical Association. We're looking forward to continuing to work with them, seeing what their concerns are, and meeting with them, continuing to negotiate with them in good faith, and making sure that the money we spend on physician compensation is going to be in the best interests of patients.

Mr. Shepherd: Given, Madam Speaker, that it's not only Alberta nurses and doctors who are getting hurt with these cuts, given that a pharmacy team of eight hard-working Albertans here in my constituency has been notified that the General continuing pharmacy will be contracted out due to AHS budget cuts and given that these doctors, nurses, and seniors depended on this team to provide in-house pharmacy services to 502 residents, a cut that barely puts a dent in this budget, and given that this team, some of whom have been there for 25 years, is already doing everything they can to reduce costs and truly care for residents and patients, will this minister immediately reverse this terrible decision?

Mr. Shandro: Madam Speaker, in our budget, our health care budget of $22 billion, we provide a grant to AHS of $12 billion. We trust AHS to be able to work within their budget of $15 billion – that includes our $12 billion grant to them – to make sure that they're spending in the best interest of patients. There are going to be decisions throughout the system by AHS and our other allied health professionals. There are going to be changes throughout the system. It means we act dynamically to react to the needs of our patients. This isn't a system that is carved in stone; it is a system that acts dynamically to react to the needs of patients.

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, last Friday a number of letters were delivered to health care unions and health care professionals across this province, and in those letters they talked about the elimination of thousands of FTEs. They talked about additional changes that were coming in the future that would significantly reduce the quality of health care. They talked about a new Ernst & Young report that would bring about even more recommendations. But what they did not do is talk about how any of this related to what this Premier ran on in the last election. I asked this Premier if he would stand up and debate these issues in a full forum so that we could fully discuss them, and he hasn't answered my question.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm very happy to be able to talk about the Ernest & Young report that we're expecting to get sometime by the end of the year so that we can release it to the public in January. I think it's going to be very informative for us as a ministry and as a government, as a province, to work with AHS. It's going to be the first time in their 10 years that someone from the outside has been able to review their processes, their policies, their structure to make sure that the spending at AHS is going to be in the best interests of patients throughout the province.

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, given that the Premier promised that he would not affect front-line services in health care – he is – and that he promised that he would respect the Canada Health Act and that his party just passed a resolution to not do that and given that they turned down our request for an emergency debate on Monday and given that they didn't say a word of those letters when they debated the health care budget just last month, will the Premier stand up for what he apparently believes is correct and debate me on these issues the way Albertans deserve?

Mr. Shandro: Madam Speaker, all of that is false. AHS has informed the unions through mandatory disclosures. It's part of the process. Throughout any negotiating process there are ups and there are downs. We look forward to continuing to work with our unions and being able to meet with them at the negotiating table so that the agreement we finally come out of with our unions is going to be making sure that the spending that we have in the health care budget is going to be in the best interests of our patients.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, given that the Member for Edmonton-City Centre just described what I believe is probably the first of thousands of real-life consequences from this government's decision to cut health care and attack health care and hurt Albertans and given that Albertans have a right to know whether any of this suffering that they will be forced to endure is worth the $4.7 billion corporate handout that that Premier just gave away and given that they have a right to a Premier who will stand up for what he allegedly believes is the right way to go, why won't the Premier commit to debating me on this issue?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Mr. Shandro: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Again we see from the NDP how naive they are. They think that the health care system, a system that's $22 billion and serves 4 point something million Albertans, should be carved in stone, that it should never change. It's actually a feature of this system that it can change to react to the best interests of our patients, that we can have change with the system and make sure that the $22 billion that we have is spent in the best interests of our patients.

Federal Fiscal Stabilization Program

Ms Rosin: Madam Speaker, in the past decade alone Albertans have paid $200 billion in equalization to the federal government. This is unfair and unsustainable, especially at a time when other prejudicial federal policies simultaneously hurt our province's economic interests. One clear issue is the paltry sum that our province has received in return from the federal fiscal stabilization program despite our recent economic hardships. To the Minister of Finance: why is Alberta receiving so little from this federal fiscal stabilization program?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Fixing the fiscal stabilization program is absolutely crucial to Albertans getting a fair deal in Confederation. I want to thank the member for her service on the fair-deal panel, which is hosting its first town hall tonight. The purpose of the fiscal stabilization program is to protect provincial revenues, but it has proven to be wholly inadequate. In 2015-16 our province experienced a $7 billion drop in revenues, yet because stabilization payments were arbitrarily capped at $60 per person, Alberta only received $251 million.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Well, given that Alberta contributes so much to Canada, without so much as a thank you from Ottawa for how much we sacrifice for the rest of this country, and given that the fiscal stabilization program has failed us in our time of greatest need, can the same minister please tell us what needs to change to ensure a fair deal for Albertans from this fiscal stabilization program?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. The key issue here is the $60 per person cap on fiscal stabilization payments. Without this cap, Alberta would have been entitled to actually $2.2 billion over two years, ending 2016-17. Our government is working with the federal government and other provinces to reverse this indefensible cap. Further, we're demanding a retroactive stabilization payment or equalization rebate of $1.7 billion.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Kananaskis.

Ms Rosin: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you again to the minister. Well, given that there was positive news yesterday after the national premiers' meeting, when it was announced that our Premier successfully convinced other Premiers to support Alberta's position on fiscal stabilization, and given that all Premiers across Canada are now committed to calling on Ottawa to reform this program and make sure that western provinces get a fair deal, can the minister explain what the next steps are to make sure that Albertans get some money rebated to us through this fiscal stabilization program?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Yes, our Premier's leadership was critical in achieving nation-wide support for our position on fiscal stabilization. The federal government cannot continue to force Albertans to contribute so much through programs such as equalization and continue to shortchange this province on fiscal stabilization. I'm working with my provincial counterparts to advocate for the same changes, and I've had productive discussions with the federal Finance minister, Bill Morneau, on this issue. Fiscal stabilization is an issue that requires correction. We're working on it. We're going to get it done.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Nechi Institute

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. For 45 years the Nechi Institute has been teaching mostly indigenous students in areas like addictions, counselling, and therapeutic training. Their courses are internationally recognized. Now this UCP government has deemed their work to not be a priority and sent the institution an eviction notice, instructing them to vacate their lodge by March 30, 2020. Will the Minister of Infrastructure immediately explain why he's evicting this group that is doing so much good in their community?

Mr. Wilson: The province of Alberta continues to be in the midst of an opioid crisis. This government's priority is to expand access to addiction treatment for all Albertans, especially indigenous Albertans, who are dying at a rate four times faster than nonindigenous in the province. As our friends at Poundmaker's Lodge state:

We believe the current government has been extremely responsive and taken . . . necessary steps to implement and support Truth and Reconciliation recommendations toward increasing treatment bed space necessary for our indigenous people's survival.

The Nechi Institute is currently occupying a strategic clinical space, and we are open to working together to find a suitable alternative location.

Mr. Feehan: You clearly haven't spoken to them.

Given that the Nechi Institute feels that remaining at their current location is important as it is "synonymous with healing facilities that work with us in concerted efforts to combat addictions plaguing our people" and given that this government claims to care about addictions and mental health services but then makes horrendous decisions like this alone, will this Associate Minister of Mental Health and Addictions tell this House whether he played a role in evicting the Nechi Institute and how exactly this fits into his ministry's approach to mental health and addictions?

Mr. Kenney: Madam Speaker, the government of Alberta is investing an additional $150 million to address the mental health and opioid addiction crises. Part of that is the creation of thousands of additional spaces for treatment, including a considerable increase in the number of treatment beds at Poundmaker's Lodge. They need to use the space to treat patients. We'll find other space for the Nechi Institute, but this is about additional beds to treat additional patients at a treatment centre. We'd like to hear some congratulations from the member opposite for that.

Mr. Feehan: Madam Speaker, the problem here is that they made a decision without . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, that certainly sounds like a bit of a preamble. I will let you restart.

Mr. Feehan: Given, Madam Speaker, that they failed to consult with the agency that they evicted before making this decision, it's completely ridiculous to defend it now, when they could simply have gone. I'd like to have this Minister of Indigenous Relations stand up and say – will you speak to the Nechi Institute to reverse this decision or at least include them in the decision instead of just arbitrarily sending them eviction notices?

Mr. Luan: As you heard our Premier talking about, this government takes it very, very seriously that we're increasing access for mental health and addiction treatment for Alberta indigenous communities. Madam Speaker, you're going to hear us make an announcement tomorrow, an important announcement, that we're significantly increasing the treatment services for indigenous communities. Along with that, you'll see that we are adjusting what we have, the limited resources, to make the space available to significantly increase the treatment and recovery health services there.

Budget 2019 and Tax Policy

Ms Phillips: Madam Speaker, this UCP government hiked every Albertan's taxes. Families are going to pay hundreds of dollars more by 2020-2021. Hundreds of people in Lethbridge – it will be thousands by the end of this UCP mandate – are losing jobs in health care, postsecondary, K to 12 education, and many other public services. The justification is the debt, but under the UCP the debt is $93 billion, and the UCP deficit is $2 billion more. Will the Minister of Finance admit that all of this is to pay for a $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout contained on page 144 of his terrible budget?

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, it's very rich to be lectured by the members opposite, who put this province on a track to a fiscal cliff, a spending trajectory of an over 4 per cent increase per year while revenues remain flat. Albertans elected this government to bring fiscal responsibility to the province. That's what Budget 2019 does. Our job-creation tax cut will attract investment, will create jobs. We're confident of that. We've had 21,000 additional private-sector jobs in October. We're confident that we will get this job done.

Ms Phillips: Well, Madam Speaker, given that this UCP government is on track to $100 billion in debt and given that Albertans will pay more to get far, far less, where is the economic analysis by this Finance minister of what will happen to small cities like Lethbridge as thousands of people lose their jobs? Will the minister provide any analysis that shows what happens to our real estate market, our small businesses, our entire economy when thousands of people are tossed out of work, or do people in my city not matter because they're not UCP friends and insiders?

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, when the members opposite were in government, they raised taxes on corporations. They raised taxes on individuals. They introduced the largest tax hike in the province's history with the carbon tax. With that, it sent investment out of this country and this province by the billions, with the jobs and opportunities, which ultimately led to lower government revenues. We will not follow that trajectory. We will take a different track. We will bring balance back to . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: Well, given, Madam Speaker, that the debt is the same and the deficit, like everyone's taxes, is going up as a result of this Finance minister's incompetence, will the Finance minister commit to at least reversing his income tax hike on everyone? Even those who are losing their jobs will pay more taxes in his spring 2020 budget. Or is the quick action from his department reserved for booking expensive trips, private jets, and handing out plum sole-source contracts to the Premier's friends?

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, the only members in this House who have raised personal taxes on Albertans are the members opposite. Our budget does not raise taxes on Albertans. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Toews: Madam Speaker, I am proud and will not make apology that we have a Premier that's travelling, that's standing up for Albertans, that's standing up for our energy industry. This was needed long ago. The members opposite failed to deliver to Albertans. We've a Premier that's delivering every day.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, in less than 30 seconds we will resume Members' Statements.

Antiracism Strategy

Mr. Deol: Thank you. Madam Speaker, today I would again like to highlight the importance of the Anti-Racism Advisory Council to the government, which has been one of the many great initiatives started by our previous NDP government that the UCP has heartlessly slashed. This council played an important role of advising the minister on how to implement tangible actions to combat racism all across the province. I asked the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women on May 29 for an update on how this government would combat racism in Alberta. I'm very disappointed that after six months the minister had no clear answer or directions for the council.

The current UCP government cancelled the grant run by the Alberta Human Rights Commission, valued at $1 million per year, that helped fund antiracism and antidiscrimination programs for decades in Alberta. This ministry has reduced the community initiative program and other initiative programs by $56.8 million over four years, which shows a clear lack of interest in combatting racism.

The minister has not come up with any initiative to fight racism or any steps to consider this particular issue a legitimate problem. Given that there has been an increase in hate crimes and extremist and separatist views, the government needs a concrete plan to combat racism. Madam Speaker, to date this UCP government has only delivered good news to big corporations.

Madam Speaker, on behalf of my constituents I strongly request that the government break the suspense behind their strategy, going forward, with the Anti-Racism Advisory Council and come up with a plan to educate students and people over the issue of racism and its impacts combined with the steps this government plans to take against any hate-related racist incidents occurring in Alberta in the future.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Lac La Biche.

30th Anniversary of l'École Polytechnique Shootings

Ms Goodridge: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This year is the 30th anniversary of the senseless murders at l'école Polytechnique de Montréal. On December 6, 1989, 14 women were killed in cold blood simply for being women, making it the deadliest mass shooting in our country's history.

Before the killer opened fire on a group of women, he told them: you're women; you're going to be engineers; you're all a bunch of feminists; I hate feminists.

The women attending l'école Polytechnique were breaking down gender barriers by studying in nontraditional fields. In doing so, they were advancing the fight for women's rights everywhere. They were proving that women could not only enter but also succeed at any academic pursuit they chose. They all had bright futures ahead of them, futures that they never had a chance to realize because of this senseless act of gender-based violence.

On December 6 we will not only remember the 14 innocent women who lost their lives 30 years ago in Montreal, but we will remember every woman who has been a victim of gender-based violence. I will personally be honouring these women as I participate in ceremonies at both the University of Alberta's Campus Saint-Jean and NAIT, and I encourage all of my colleagues and fellow Albertans to find one of the many memorial services occurring on December 6 across our province and take a few minutes to remember these women and all of the victims of gender-based violence.

Together we can fight hatred and violence. Together we will honour them and remember them.

Thank you.

Oil and Gas Industries

Mr. Sigurdson: Madam Speaker, I started my working life on a drilling rig in the oil and gas sector. I've seen first-hand how the industry has progressed over the past three decades. The environmental innovations and technology improvements that come from our industry have made us global leaders. We have set the bar on environmental and ethical production across the planet.

I stand here every day in support of Alberta's oil and gas sector and its hard-working people. This includes mothers and fathers who sometimes spend weeks or months on end away from their families in order to put food on the table. Alberta's oil and gas sector is the backbone of our economy.

The need for oil and gas in our everyday lives is everywhere. We need it to heat our homes, to get to work, power the Internet, right down to the clothes on our backs. That is why this government understands how crucial it is for us to build pipelines. It's time that we stand proud and also advocate for what our oil and gas sector can do to improve the environment on a global scale. The demand for this industry is not going away in the near future, and the increase in demand should be met by the most environmentally and ethically produced energy in the world, so it's heartbreaking when we see companies like EnCana relocate their headquarters.

Gwyn Morgan, former CEO of EnCana, said, and I'll quote: I'm deeply saddened that as a result of the disastrous policies of the Trudeau government, what was once one of the largest Canadian-headquartered energy producers now sees both its CEO and the core of its asset base located in the U.S. End quote.

Regardless, after numerous delays this government is now on track to see additional capacity for Enbridge line 3, and we will fulfill another campaign promise with pipe for TMX going in the ground before Christmas. This government will not stop there. We will continue to work tirelessly for more pipelines. We were elected to stand up for Albertans, create jobs, restore our economy, and get pipelines built. We will do just that.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Public Accounts Committee

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today on behalf of Albertans to stand up for their best interests and to remind ourselves that our primary goal as legislators is to represent them to the best of our abilities. As deputy chair of the Public Account Committee I am an outspoken advocate of leaving partisanship at the door in our all-important work. Our objective and focus should be to respectfully hold our ministries, agencies, boards, commissions, and Crown corporations to account in a nonpartisan manner in bringing government policies to life for everyday Albertans. Fifteen members of this Assembly have the privilege of serving on Public Accounts, and our mandate is to review the reports of the Auditor General of Alberta and the public accounts of this province.

The Canadian Audit and Accountability Foundation's list of best practices strongly reinforces that public accounts committees function most effectively when partisan behaviour is left behind. We have heard from our federal peers how their Public Accounts Committee has found a way to check their partisan hats at the door and, in doing so, have passed 70 unanimous motions in recent years. Madam Speaker, that's 12 members from three politically diverse federal parties passing 70 unanimous motions. If outcomes that are in the best interests of all Albertans are the objective and nonpartisan perspectives help us to achieve this, then I would strongly suggest that this is what we should collectively strive for as we end this session and focus on doing our best work in 2020 and beyond.

I am proud of the unbiased clarity and focus demonstrated by UCP members, eight of them fresh, new, and idealistic MLAs who have kept their promise to hold their government to account during their first year in office. Make no mistake that on this side of the House our commitment to holding the government to account, to working hard for Albertans, and to leaving our partisan hats at the door will be unwavering in the years ahead. We humbly thank you for the honour and opportunity to serve.

Thank you.

Presenting Petitions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise again to table under the appropriate portion of the Routine a petition that I brought forward yesterday on behalf of a constituent from my riding. It's a petition signed by 232 Albertans. The petition urges the government of Alberta to introduce legislation that a pet store operator or a vendor at a reptile, bird, or mammal exhibition shall not sell any live mammal, bird, reptile, or amphibian unless the animal was obtained from an animal rescue organization or a humane society shelter.

Thank you.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, I have a tabling, five copies of the LAO annual report. Thank you.

Any other members wishing to make a tabling? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I have a couple of tablings today. First, several copies of letters that I've received – I'm sure other colleagues have received similar letters – from teachers talking about their deep concerns about class sizes as well as how it relates to what the Learning Commission says are appropriate class sizes and on the complexity in their classrooms as well.

I'll be tabling those as well as letters I've received from a number of Albertans talking specifically about cuts to public education and specifically the attack on public education that is being proposed through the now UCP policy, passed on the weekend, of a voucher system here in the province of Alberta, which, of course, would push an American-style education model. These Albertans are deeply concerned.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Certainly, my constituency office has been deluged with hundreds of letters from Alberta teachers, teachers in my riding, regarding their retirement fund. I'm tabling 27 more today, and I have the requisite copies.

Also, I have a second tabling, which is, again, about education, about public education, and just some significant concerns that constituents of my riding have regarding the cuts to education.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm tabling five copies of four letters. The first is from Ms Pringle, a constituent concerned about her public service pension and Bill 22's removal of that joint governance.

The next one is to Alisha, a public servant, a 20-year city worker who's worried sick that Bill 22 fundamentally affects her retirement future, from Ms Sellars, a teacher concerned about class sizes growing, her pension, and the lack of suitable funding.

Mr. Fouhy, a teacher, disagrees vehemently that his ATRF pension was invested in AIMCo and moved.

Lastly, Mr. Haskoylu, a parent of two children in public school, is concerned about the job cuts affecting the quality of his kids' education.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The former Member for Calgary-Buffalo and current Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to table copies of letters from Albertans as well. These Albertans are concerned about the provincial government taking over their pensions, whether LAPP, CPP, ATRF, or AIMCo. I will not read the first letter since it's not very parliamentary.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to table the requisite number of copies of an e-mail from my constituent on behalf of close family friends who are constituents of the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek. They are deeply concerned about this government's decision to withdraw coverage of Remicade and the impact it will have on their young son.

I would also like to table the requisite number of copies of 35 e-mails from constituents who are concerned and expressing their strong objection to the government's decision to seize their pension. Their message to the government is that they should keep their hands off their pensions.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I have again dozens of letters from Grande Prairie, Red Deer, Calgary, and Edmonton from citizens that are very upset about this government taking their pensions without their permission.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have two tablings I'd like to make. The first is a number of e-mails received from folks, again, all across Alberta who are quite concerned about the budget, in particular cuts to the public sector.

The next tabling I would like to make: a number of e-mails, again, from folks from Red Deer-North and from other parts of Red Deer who are quite concerned about education funding.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to table the appropriate number of copies of a document that I would recommend all MLAs read entitled The Five Corrupt Pillars of Climate Change Denial.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on behalf of the Member for St. Albert to submit the appropriate number of copies of an article entitled Exposing the Canadian Oil Sector's Victim Complex: "This is part four of a four-part series, in which Canada's National Observer presents a data-based dismantling of the false claim that Alberta's oil and gas sector has been targeted by a cabal of American foundations."

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I did not realize that the Clerk had some tablings today. As such, I will use my ability within the standing orders to extend the Routine.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the clerk: on behalf of hon. Mr. Shandro, Minister of Health, pursuant to the Health Professions Act the College of Hearing Aid Practitioners of Alberta annual report 2018-19.

On behalf of hon. Mr. Toews, President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, pursuant to the Gaming, Liquor and Cannabis Act the Alberta Gaming, Liquor and Cannabis annual report 2018-19.

On behalf of hon. Mr. Madu, Minister of Municipal Affairs, response to a question raised by MLA Ceci, hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, on November 7, 2019, in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs main estimates debate.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we are now at points of order. I noted two points of order. The first one was from the Official Opposition at 2:21. That's confirming the confusion that we had earlier.

The only point of order is by the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Yes. I am raising a point of order under Standing Order 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." At about 2:21 in an exchange between the Minister of Children's Services and the Member for Spruce Grove-Stony Plain I and I think many others in this House clearly heard the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford use a vulgar phrase that is clearly unparliamentary. Now, I would prefer not to repeat the words, but I would say that the phrase would represent the subject matter of someone who studies bovine scatology. Now, I'm sure that the hon. member has an education, but I don't believe that that's probably the subject matter of his education. I would ask at this time that the member retract that and apologize to the House.

Mr. Feehan: Madam Speaker, I admit I said the words and that they were wrong, because I assume that they are not full, but they're probably down a quart. As a result, I withdraw the words and apologize to the House. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, would you like to try that one more time?

Mr. Feehan: Madam Speaker, I withdraw the words and apologize to the House.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you. I will consider that matter now dealt with.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to move third reading of Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, but first I would like to commend the benevolence, the compassion for democracy of our Government House Leader, who in an upcoming motion will actually return Bill 26 back to Committee of the Whole. I am happy to have more time to debate Bill 26, which actually will repeal and replace the disastrous and failed NDP Bill 6. Throughout the development of this piece of legislation we had 25 consultations – about half of the government caucus attended those – to hear directly from farmers. From Irvine to Fairview, from Grande Prairie to Drumheller we talked to thousands of farmers. The four main themes of this piece of legislation are employment standards, labour relations, occupational health and safety, and insurance. With that we had very positive responses from the farming community.

I'm happy to hear how the debate unfolds this afternoon. Thank you.

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you. First of all, it's my first opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 26. I'd like to just take a brief moment through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister of agriculture, my neighbour to the east in central Alberta and my friend, and congratulate him on this important piece of legislation as well as the minister of labour, who have worked very, very hard. I must say, on behalf of the constituents of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, through you to him, thank you very much for beginning to push us back on a path to be able to defend our farm and ranching communities and the constituents that I have the privilege to represent and to undo the disgrace that was Bill 6 that we saw inside this Chamber inside the 29th Legislature.

The hon. minister is correct. I do intend to move a recommittal momentarily. Actually, you know how I'm going to handle this, if it's okay with you, Mr. Speaker, is that I will send the amendments to the table and then give my remarks at that point when you give me permission to. As soon as we have a page, and they're coming. I didn't give them much notice.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, we will just give the pages a couple of seconds to just pass out the amendment. Then, going forward, what I will do is that I will ask that you read it into the record. Going forward also, we will be referring to this as REC1, so if the pages could, please.

Hon. Government House Leader, prior to having you read it in, hon. members, if you don't know yet, this is a recommittal amendment being proposed by the hon. Government House Leader. The purpose of the recommittal amendment to the motion for third reading is to return a bill to Committee of the Whole for the reconsideration of certain specified sections. If this amendment to recommit Bill 26 to Committee of the Whole is carried, the committee may consider only sections 1(3) and 2(2).

Hon. Government House Leader, if you would please read it into the record and then continue with your statements.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that the motion for third reading of Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, be not now read a third time but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reconsidering sections 1(3) and 2(2).

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that you took a few moments to explain to the House what this amendment means. It is very rare, obviously, inside this Chamber, particularly for the government side of the House, to move a recommittal amendment, the first time, certainly, for me and the first time that I've ever seen it in my time in the Chamber from any Government House Leader.

The reality is that I want to be very, very clear. The side of the House, the government side of the House, completely and fully supports Bill 26, Mr. Speaker. I know I will be voting for Bill 26 at each and every stage. Again, through you, I thank the minister of agriculture for bringing this important piece of legislation to this Chamber. Having said that, I have always said, as has the Premier, that I respect the role of the Official Opposition. I was proud to serve in the Official Opposition inside this Chamber in the 29th Legislature, and they do have an important and constitutional role in our democracy. I've always said that I will go out of my way to make sure that they have ample time to be able to participate in debate and do their important work within our democracy.

I spoke, when we were dealing with time allocation on Bill 22, Mr. Speaker, about the fact that government House leaders and opposition House leaders work together to be able to have the flow of debate in the Legislature move forward so that things can pass and, ultimately, the business of Albertans can be done in this Chamber. Sometimes time allocation or using standing orders to move that forward when you are at points where there basically is going to be no resolution to disagreements is how this Chamber is designed. Other times opposition House leaders will spend their time limiting which members of theirs speak so they can strategically use certain members of this House to be able to deliver a message better. As you do know, often a Government House Leader will ask his members not to speak nearly as much on pieces of legislation to provide the opposition more time to do their work. That's the process. It's how our system works, and I'm proud to participate in that as the Government House Leader.

Last week the opposition reached out to me, Mr. Speaker, to ask and to point out that they had mistakenly or somehow stopped debate on Bill 26 in Committee of the Whole and it had passed in committee, but they felt that they wanted to be able to still move forward some amendments. Hearing that and recognizing that we had time, I wanted to be able to accommodate that process, to be able to provide the opposition ample opportunity to debate this important piece of legislation and to bring forward their amendments. Of course, the minister of agriculture and his team will evaluate those amendments. Me moving this recommittal does not mean that the government is committed to the amendments. We haven't actually seen them yet. But it does mean that the government is committed to giving the opposition ample time to do their important role inside this Legislature.

I do want to close with making it clear, as I did in the beginning, that the government and our government caucus inside this Chamber fully support Bill 26. It's a long time coming, Mr. Speaker. We campaigned on getting rid of the hated NDP Bill 6. I am very excited that it looks like we are getting close to that work being done, and I encourage all of our members to continue to work hard to be able to get Bill 26 out of the Assembly so it can receive royal assent and the NDP Bill 6 can finally be repealed. We can add that to the big pile of promises made and promises kept by this government.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Government House Leader. Are there any hon. members looking to debate REC1?

I'm not surprised to see that there are none, so I'm prepared to ask the question.

[Motion on amendment REC1 carried]

3:10 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 26 Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: The Committee of the Whole has under consideration sections 1(3) and 2(2) of Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019. Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered at this time on these sections of the bill? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair and to my colleagues for this opportunity to continue debate in committee, which I believe is a fundamental and important stage of bill consideration.

I do want to answer the question raised by the Government House Leader around not recalling this ever happening, reverting to committee. To remind members who were here in the 29th sitting of the Legislature, we did indeed do this with a bill in health once. There was a bill where the opposition had significantly advocated, and upon reflection we in the government thought it was important to reconsider one of the amendments that had been proposed by them and to propose one of our own, and we did indeed go back to committee. While it doesn't happen often, it certainly has happened. I would say that when we did it previously with that health bill, it led to better outcomes, better legislation, and a bill that I think both sides of the House were proud to vote through in its final stage. So it's not something that is done lightly, but it is certainly something that I think can improve legislation overall. That certainly is my hope for the debate we're engaging in here this afternoon.

I do know that my colleagues will have some amendments with regard to particular sections in this legislation, and I'll be happy to speak to those amendments at that time, but at this point I want to highlight some of my concerns as the bill currently stands. I also want to begin by acknowledging that I am well aware that this was definitely in the UCP platform. This is one thing that was campaigned on, to bring in a bill to repeal the legislation brought in by the previous government, but what we're considering here today doesn't just do that. It goes back to far, far greater rollbacks on protected rights for workers than just those that we brought in when we did bring in the previous Bill 6. So while there is a mandate, I would say, to reverse the progress that was made under that bill, I don't believe there is a mandate to roll back rights for workers even further than that.

I'm going to start by talking about a couple of areas. In earlier stages of debate one of the things that was said, probably by the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry – if not him, I'm happy to be corrected as to who said it – was that a testament to the great working relationship between farmers and workers is the fact that no farm workers chose to organize, unionize, or engage in collective bargaining during the period that this law was in place, which I think is a fine argument if you're going to keep that right in place down the road and people choose not to exercise it. I think taking away that right takes away that argument because, of course, you are no longer giving the right to have a choice in your relationship, and to work collectively, as many Charter cases have proven, is constitutional. Not to be collective is unconstitutional; therefore, the right to collective bargaining is a constitutional right. There have been many cases that have argued that point. So here we are rolling back that right. Disappointing but perhaps not the thing that I find most difficult in this.

One of the areas that I do find incredibly difficult – and on the right to organize, of course, that's a breach, so I don't want to downplay that. I do find that offensive, but one that I find probably even more so is the rules around overtime and overtime pay. And I get it. While I was a town kid, my grandparents had a farm, and we spent a considerable amount of time after my gido passed away with my baba on her farm. She told many stories about how the men that they hired over the years, while my gido was still alive and then those who helped in the transition years when he was sick and then later after the land was rented out, made such a big difference to their quality of life and their ability to have a farm, a mixed farm with dairy and eggs and grain and often hogs as well.

I understand that there are times where they will have to work overtime, naturally during calving season, which is my favourite time to visit up north and spend time with my friends on their farm. I pretend to help out. I mostly just drive the Gator and look for wagging tails. There is something about that excitement and that time of year, you know, knowing that you're only going to get four or five hours of sleep at a time, but that's okay because you're out there to save a calf, a calf that is, obviously, a life, but it's also a thousand bucks, give or take, right? You're out there, and you know that you've got a chance to save a thousand bucks if you catch a calf and a cow that are in distress and make sure that they can make it through the night and get the care that they need.

I deeply enjoy those times on the farm. But I do think that it is worth recognizing that when someone goes above and beyond in terms of the hours that they work, there be some type of additional compensation for that. Maybe it's with time in lieu. I know that there are a lot of folks who help, who are farm workers on farms, and when the quieter time hits, you know, November, December, that's a great time to take off a number of days, go on vacation, and not worry about pay in any way.

I do think that that should be rewarded, that extra dedication during particularly tough times like calving season or harvest as well. Of course, you can't predict the weather and you can't schedule 9 to 5 and you certainly can't always schedule 40 hours a week, but when somebody busts their hump and puts in, you know, an 80-hour week, I think that they deserve to be recognized and have that additional time paid back to them with some kind of premium.

I think we will probably hear arguments that that naturally happens, and I think probably for the vast majority it does, but the reason why we have laws is to protect the minority. The reason why we have speed limits on our highways is not because we think everyone will drive erratically and put lives in danger. The reason why we have those is to make sure that if somebody does behave in a way that's unsafe for others, there are consequences for that.

That's one of the reasons why I think it's important to have legislation, to protect the minority who are at risk. I would say that by taking away these rights that have been in place for a number of years – this isn't something that was just brought in recently. I think that when we take away rights, we erode our responsibility of pursuing justice for all and improving conditions for all, something that we literally pray for in this House every day and that I think is our mandate.

Additionally, the working-hours section I think has some concerns for me in particular, about what it is we are going to be eroding by changing these requirements.

I also think that putting in a marker of five – and I'd be happy to hear more from the minister as to why he chose five. I guess that you have to pick a number at some point, but five seems a little bit arbitrary to me, so that is a concern for me.

Those are some of what I'd say are my highest areas of concern. You know, this isn't something that a lot of people have been feeling brave to speak up on, but there are a number of people who have spoken up. For example, there were some folks, part of the AgCoalition, that said that repealing the farm safety act would be throwing out a lot of good with the bad. Of course, I don't think we're in this place to do that, you know, to do revenge-seeking politics. I think we're here to do good for all. I think that there were certainly a number of positives in the farm safety act that should have been maintained.

Also, we have the National Farmers Union. Glenn Norman, who has a farm at Kneehill, says that it's made people more aware of the real issues that there are around safety and that it's important that safety be a top priority for anyone, whether you own a farm or whether you're working on a farm for somebody else. These are things that I think should be foundational, that everyone should make sure that we have basic standards in place for.

I have to say that I think some of the changes that are being proposed go far beyond what was campaigned on in the mandate and are rather regressive. I think our Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has been quite articulate in highlighting some of those, particularly ones around having any kind of minimum wage. I know a lot of people who enter into agricultural work do it for a love, a commitment, and a passion for the land, for being stewards of that land as well as for the livestock that they care for or fowl or other living things on their farm. But they also deserve, in my opinion, to have a fair and at least a minimum wage of some sort. Relying on those who are in vulnerable positions to find some way to fight for their own rights, when the government won't even put a basic minimum wage in law to ensure their protection, I think is really harmful. I think it's counterproductive, and I think it could have serious negative effects for folks who want to choose a career in agriculture.

But when you look at having – you do have OH and S. Let me also say that a lot of people I know who work in agriculture, work in other sectors as well. They work in oil and gas, or they work in forestry. Many fight fires in the summers in the area that I grew up in. They are ways to supplement the farm income. When they work off-farm on those sites, they very capably adapt to OH and S and other restrictions because they are smart, they're capable, and they certainly are able to and wanting to ensure their own safety so that they can return from their other job, that supplements the farm, back to their farm. I think having basic safety standards is certainly fair and reasonable.

I think that all of us probably know somebody who has been injured in a farm accident. I'll tell you about my own uncle, Uncle John Krupa,* who had the original family homestead out at Thorhild. He was stuck in his baler for three days.

Member Ceci: Holy jeez.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. And he lost his arm.

I'm not saying that increased OH and S standards may have saved him. They may have. Fortunately, he survived that accident. But, certainly, if he would have had somebody checking on him more frequently, his quality of life and that incident may not have been as traumatizing as it was. He sure was able to find the most in life, and he said that the hook could still help him pull calves. Certainly, it was very effective at scaring the great-nieces and -nephews around the kitchen table. But I don't think that anyone should be in a position where they have increased risk and hardship done to them. That's why I think that having some basic OH and S requirements would not necessarily be a bad thing. I think it could be a very good thing.

I agree that farmers, farm owners and farm workers, probably all want to be safe. They all want to be safe and make sure that they can come home at the end of the night to their families, and I think that government could certainly support them in that effort. I don't think it's unfair or unreasonable in any way for us to have basic standards in that way. Basic compensation standards as well as basic safety standards I think should be a right. I don't think that they should be a privilege afforded to those who happen to land on a good employer. I think that everyone who works hard should deserve a basic minimum wage and should deserve basic safety measures to ensure that they can provide for themselves and the folks that they love as well as be safe.

Those are some of my main concerns. I'm grateful that we're returning to committee and, therefore, have an opportunity to bring forward some amendments. Again I'll say that when that health care bill came forward, passed through committee, and then went back, it was obviously an opportunity for us to reconsider some of the points that the opposition made that seemed fair, that seemed reasonable, and that seemed like an opportunity to put in some increased accountability measures. At that time it was for folks in regulated health professions, and at this time it's for protecting vulnerable farm workers.

The last thing I want to say is a comment on the title of the bill, the Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019. I felt a little throwback to the days of the then Member for Strathmore-Brooks. Derek Fildebrandt definitely liked to talk about freedom a lot. Anyway, a little shout-out to him. I don't think his name has been said in this place in a long time, and I didn't expect that I would be the one to say it, but in regard to this bill definitely a throwback to him screaming the word "freedom."

Thank you very much, hon. members.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members? I believe I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair, for recognizing me this afternoon to add my voice for the first time to debate on Bill 26, a piece of legislation that I have some significant concerns with. Like I've said, with my background being in labour I get hung up on the language. I'm always looking for the bogeyman in it. I'm always looking for how language is set up that could create a negative situation. We've certainly seen some interesting points made around language in this Chamber, you know, very recently things like "may" being the same as "will" and "shall." When I see those kinds of things, I'm always looking for how they will negatively impact people.

Just before we had the opportunity to send this back to committee, of course, I couldn't help but notice the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and the Government House Leader congratulating themselves quite profusely around taking away hard-working farm and ranch employees' rights, rights that, believe it or not, have existed in every other part of this country for well over a decade at the very minimum. I remember discussions in the 29th Legislature, you know, having been very honoured and fortunate to be able to serve during that time, talking about how bringing these kinds of pieces of legislation would absolutely destroy the farm, yet I couldn't help but wonder why the same pieces of legislation that were already in place in other parts of the country had not done that. They were operating just fine. Employees' rights were protected, and they had the ability, when things went wrong, to have a safety net.

The first thing I wanted to bring up, Mr. Chair, was around when we were talking about how we want to get this done very, very quickly so that we can get these changes in effect, but the problem is we've already seen changes that are already in effect, yet the bill hasn't actually really fully passed yet. There's this quest that I've seen the government on around slamming through legislation at breakneck speeds, and we've very, very clearly seen that there has been no consultations around those types of things. I think that when you're talking about the safety of employees, we really need to make a diligent effort to communicate with those employees that are potentially put at risk.

When we look at taking away some of the occupational health and safety rights, what Bill 26 is proposing here right now, again, having been fortunate enough to serve in the 29th Legislature, I remember debating some of these things when they were first being proposed to come in. Something that absolutely shocked me when I first learned about it was a story of a farm. I'm hoping that I'm remembering the area in which it occurred, somewhere in the Edson, Hinton area, Mr. Chair. Unfortunately, there was an accident on that farm, and that farm employee lost his life.

His widow had to go through the court system, and that fight spanned six years in duration, Mr. Chair. Six years later she finally did get a judgment awarded in her favour. She would probably have very much rather traded that judgment for her spouse. What happened was: great; she got the judgment, got compensated, but the result was that that farm had to declare bankruptcy. It was destroyed because of that judgment. There was no system in place to protect both sides.

You know, to members opposite: all it takes is one example that puts the onus on us to make sure that that doesn't happen again, yet here we are in Bill 26 reversing that safety net that not only would have protected that farm worker's spouse but would have protected the farm from going out of business. We have to be able to balance those things. This bill is rolling that back.

The next thing I wanted to point out is under subsection (2)(a)(iv). Again, Mr. Chair, the language gets me hung up on things, and this is probably some of the most concerning language I have ever seen. The reason I say that – you know what? I probably heard the Minister of Transportation say the same thing back when he served in opposition in the 29th Legislature. “You guys won a majority government. I get it. You get the opportunity to change things, undo things, go in a different direction. Absolutely. That’s what you get to do.”

You know, when you form a majority government, that’s what happens. You campaigned, as I understand, to repeal the changes we made around farms and ranches. I understand that. But this language right here in (2)(a)(iv), where it says that “a person employed on a farming or ranching operation as determined under subsection (2) whose employment is directly related to the farming or ranching [experience]” – now, I’m not going to continue to read on; everybody is able to do that – what that does, based on the language that we are seeing there, is that it fundamentally changes the definition of an employee.

Yes, you won a majority government. You’re allowed to repeal what we did. I don’t think you got a mandate from people to take the whole discussion around what an employee is back a hundred years. You are fundamentally telling people in an industry that they can’t even be called an employee anymore, and that is very concerning.

Now, Mr. Chair, I understand – and I doubt that on what I’m about to say, there would be any member in the House that would disagree with me. I think we have some of the most fantastic farmers and large farming corporations, arguably, I would say, on the continent. I don’t think anybody would debate me on that. But what I’ve learned in my experience in labour is that when you have so many fantastic employers, there’s always one bad actor that will take legislation like this and will absolutely use it against their employee. I’ve seen it happen. Again, all it takes is one.

Thinking back to that story I said earlier around that widow having to go through all of that hassle to get a judgment, after I’ve finished speaking, maybe the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry will get up and tell me – I’m wondering if he consulted with the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction about creating that kind of a hassle again. Apparently, that ministry is there at a cost of $10 million to taxpayers to help the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry reduce red tape, to make it easier for everybody. I’m hoping that he’ll let me know that he did consult and that that was the way to go, in which case I would argue that that’s creating red tape, which is not what you’re supposed to be doing.

I also couldn’t help but zone in here on the fact that because we’re changing the language around employee and some of the other language changes that we’re seeing in Bill 26, it repeals the rights for farm workers to unionize. Now, again, as somebody who’s come from the labour movement, I’ve always said very clearly to people: if the employer treats their employees with dignity and respect, if they pay them a decent wage, if they give them some benefits – surprise, surprise – it’s very, very difficult to unionize that kind of a workplace.

You know, here’s where I will use the same example again as I always have. I’ve been a part of trying to unionize Costco, and every time I always heard: “Well, I get paid a good rate. I have benefits. I get sick time. There are occupational health and safety rules in place to keep me safe. My boss just treats me good.” We weren’t able to organize Costco. Surprise, surprise.

But then you get examples where you see, for instance, a particular restaurant – it happens to have been close by; it’s under different management now – bouncing cheques to their employees. They weren’t treating them with dignity and respect. I even remember one of the problems that employees had, specifically the female employees. The owners were asking them to wear very degrading outfits because that would boost business. That’s one example. All it takes is one, Mr. Chair. That’s usually the case for why you bring in these kinds of changes to protect people. This bill is failing miserably at that, based on the language.

Now, I could certainly say, you know, from what I saw during the 29th Legislature and what I’ve seen during this Legislature, Mr. Chair, that there are probably members of the government and caucus side that aren’t very appreciative of what the labour movement has done, not only for them but also for their constituents. I mean, I seem to remember a comment in the last Legislature around: well, unions are just human traffickers. One of the silliest things I’ve ever heard.

That kind of makes me wonder. With sentiments like that, those potentially are workplaces that need to be unionized so that they are able to work safely on-site, so that they are treated with dignity and respect, so that they do get a fair wage, so that they do get benefits. This language that we are seeing proposed throughout Bill 26 is allowing those single bad actors to run roughshod over Albertans, the people you were elected to protect, the people you were elected to advocate for, the people you were elected to keep safe.

I guess I’m stunned, Mr. Chair. Like I said: I get it. They won a majority government. They were able to come in and make changes on things that we did to try to make good on those pledges that we had been elected on in the 29th Legislature. But like I mentioned earlier, very clearly, you were not given a mandate to take labour legislation back a hundred years.

Mr. Chair, I will be watching closely as this legislation is more than likely put into place. I don’t know if any of the amendments that will be proposed will be accepted. I hope they will. As the Official Opposition we’re here to help. We’re going to try to make, well, some bad legislation less bad and try to protect Albertans from being taken advantage of or, even worse, when we have temporary foreign workers that are coming in, having them treated even worse because this legislation will be enabling for those bad actors.

As we see the fallout from these changes, I hope that the government and members of the caucus are going to be willing to stand up and take responsibility and say, “Yeah, we made those changes; that was us, so that’s all on us, and we accept responsibility for what goes wrong,” and that they’ll be willing to stand in front of those people and say: “We got it wrong. We didn’t protect you.” Hopefully, it won’t be a case of the worst-case scenario where you’re standing in front of a family member saying, “We should have protected your loved one,” because occupational health and safety rules weren’t in place.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen to speak.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I’m grateful for the opportunity to speak on Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, and grateful that we have an opportunity as well to offer some amendments to this same bill. You know, I find it interesting to look through this bill and how it does repeal some or almost all of Bill 6. I certainly do understand logically the government’s execution of their mandate and platform to in fact bring in replacement legislation. I mean, that’s what they said they would do, and they’re doing it. That’s all fine and good.

But there are some sections in this Bill 26 that I think should have some further scrutiny on them. I think that what we might see a case of here is that Bill 26, in repealing the former Bill 6, has some overreaching activity going on. By repealing or no longer allowing any right to unionize or to collective bargaining for farm workers and, you know, talking about repealing the WCB coverage and some other areas as well, I think we need to take sort of a logical second look at these things.

We all know that, as with all things, our farming industry is evolving over time. Indeed, it's a very strong part of our economy here in the province of Alberta. It's a historic part of who we are as a province and indeed is a modern part of our economy that is producing lots of value-added products and, of course, producing the essential food that we need and so forth. Part of that evolution and that phenomenon, Mr. Chair, is that we see a movement from the traditional family farm – right? – to larger commercial or industrial operations. I think this is a phenomenon that we see in other parts of the world as well. As you see the consolidation of individual family farms into larger commercial or industrial units, then it's important for the labour laws to keep pace with that change as well. In other words, you have more people working as employees on farms, and you have more, you know, larger operations and people working for wages and on shifts and so forth.

While it's, I think, eminently reasonable to have some concession for the particular ways by which the, you know, farms do operate and the seasonal activities do take place, like harvest and calving season and all of those things – you know that you have to accommodate for that – you also have to accommodate within a framework of some standards for labour.

Again, we do produce regulation and law here in this provincial body, and we do it for a whole range of human activity. When we do make laws generally here, we don't do it with the notion that individuals are inherently going to break laws or to push them but with the contingency that some might be doing that. We have rules around traffic and safety and criminal law and so forth, not to presume that the vast majority of Albertans do in fact break those rules and laws but for the protection of individuals, for the contingency, the possibility that someone might do that at some point in time, right?

Having some standards for labour, let's say, in the agricultural industry, I think, is a reasonable move forward considering the historic evolution towards larger commercial operations here in the province of Alberta and to make sure that we're protecting people every step of the way. We want the agriculture industry to flourish, as it has for the entire history of the province of Alberta. It's been a backbone of both our economy and who we are, I think, as Albertans, and we want to keep it that way, right? Part of the way by which you can do so is to make sure you are building a framework of regulation that protects people who do work in that industry.

I have a couple of issues that I just want to bring forward in regard to Bill 26. The first one that I am a bit concerned about is that Bill 26 removes the right for agricultural workers to form or join a union by excluding them in the terminology of employees from the Labour Relations Code. I just want to point out, you know, that we don't want to make laws that otherwise will be challenged later. That's a problem, right? I know that the Alberta Labour Relations Board ruled that the exclusion of other workers, in this case of nurse practitioners, I believe, from the Labour Relations Code was deemed to be unconstitutional. The nurses tried to bring them into a bargaining unit in a formal manner, and the Alberta Labour Relations Board found that that exclusion was, in fact, unconstitutional, saying that these workers were not managers. That's where the state of play is for those particular workers. Excluding any workforce from being called, quote, unquote, employees, I think, is problematic at the very least. I think that it's worth it to explore that and perhaps make some adjustment to Bill 26 to ensure that we are staying on the right side of constitutionality and the rule of law.

Another issue that I just wanted to bring forward is around, you know, this idea of excluding a group of employees that aren't managers and whether the government is understanding that the exclusion of certain groups of employees like nurse practitioners and/or farm workers is going to stand up in court. It's a worthwhile thing to look at. I mean, that's a very reasonable thing that we can pursue, and I believe that it is part of our responsibility as legislators to make sure that the laws we're making are legal, so to speak, right?

What else did I want to bring up generally? I think that section 21 talks about the rights of employees and employers under the code. Subsection (1) provides:

An employee has the right

- (a) to be a member of a trade union and to participate in . . . lawful activities, and
- (b) to bargain collectively with the employee's employer . . .

Again, if we are moving outside of those statutory rights, I'm just concerned that we might be ending up with a problem down the road.

I think that we do understand generally the government's direction in regard to bringing forward legislation here, but, again, talking about excluding people from the coverage of the Workers' Compensation Board, I think, has a problem inherently built into it as well. We know that the WCB, while it's had its problems over the years, is a way by which you can help to protect not just workers, but you do in fact protect employers as well because they actually will move in and provide the services that an injured worker might need straight away. I believe that WCB coverage also protects the employer from litigation, right? That is a big deal when it comes to injury and people being sued for those injuries. The WCB is a way by which we can help, you know, both to get timely access to, perhaps, rehabilitation that an individual needs and to protect employers from being involved in litigation as a result of a workplace accident.

I mean, those are the two things that I kind of wanted to bring forward at this time. I think that always, you know, we need to cut through some of the hyperbole and rhetoric that we might use around farm safety and so forth and look for what the best way is (a) to ensure the protection of human beings working in any industry, specifically in the farm industry, and, two, to ensure the continued prosperity and support of the agriculture industry by this provincial body, the Legislature.

Those are my initial comments, and I think we might have a couple of amendments that might help to address those issues that I just brought up. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen to speak.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise today and speak to Bill 26. I think I'll begin by actually saying thank you to the government for being able to move this back so that we can consider some amendments to this. I think that that's an important thing. I have, it will be no surprise to anyone to discover, a number of concerns with this bill.

Certainly, I have always been concerned when you're talking about any employee being sort of excluded from the Employment Standards Code. Normally when you talk about people who are excluded from the Employment Standards Code, you're talking about workers that have a relatively high amount of power relative to their employer.

For instance, when I was practising as a lawyer – lawyers are excluded from the Employment Standards Code. Well, again, lawyers are fairly educated professionals, and there are not that many of them, so that gives them a certain relative sort of strength of negotiating position, shall we say. Now, certainly, I'm sure that there are articling students who would argue that they lack said strength of negotiating position, and I've in fact heard jokes of people who've actually worked out, you know, on the 100-or-so hour week that they work, what their actual hourly wage is. Ultimately, I think those individuals are in a position to advocate for themselves. That's the same reason that we have managers that tend to be excluded from some of these provisions, because, again, they're sort of in charge of the area. They have a relatively sort of high level of power in the situation.

But when we talk about farm workers being excluded, I think my concern is that many of those people are not in the same position. They're not always in possession of sort of extended educational criteria. They're often not even citizens of this country, which puts them in a very, very tenuous position. I won't go on at length about the difficulty that temporary foreign workers experience, but in my previous employment the people that came into my office and the things that they had experienced as temporary foreign workers were shocking. It was incredibly eye-opening to someone who has lived in this society for as long as I had and not really known that this was something that was going on.

I'm not saying this about everyone who employs temporary foreign workers. In fact, I have known some people who employ temporary foreign workers who are very, very good, who are good advocates for their employees, who want to help people come here so they can send money back home or so they can ultimately immigrate to Canada and bring their family over. There are some fantastic employers.

But we don't make the laws to deal with those who behave well on their own; we make the laws to deal with those who do not behave so well on their own. I had heard some incredible stories. So when we're talking about excluding these people, it's a huge concern. When you're talking about excluding them from even recourse to employment standards, what that means is that if they aren't paid, like, if they're not paid at all, they have to sue in court. Well, first of all, that's a lengthy and complicated process. That's the reason employment standards exist in the first place, so that people have a simpler process that doesn't involve hiring a lawyer. Secondly, given how long it takes to get a court date, if you're someone who's not in the country permanently, you may never get resolution. You may be gone before this even comes up. I think that all of those things are a big concern.

I've spoken, I think, at length previously to this bill about my views on why WCB coverage is important and about the fact that one of the things that WCB coverage brings with it that people don't always contemplate or consider is the fact that that coverage is no-fault. Rather than someone having to sue, the coverage is just: if the necessary elements are proven – that the worker was injured, they were injured at work, they need certain compensation or certain medical care – then that's it. That's the end of the issue.

Now, admittedly, the WCB process is imperfect. It has certainly been the case that people have sort of bounced around from appeal boards and had some significant troubles with WCB. I'm not going to suggest for a second that that isn't the case. Compared, however, to the process that they receive when they have to deal with a private insurance company who's making them sue, that process is significantly better, because there are things set up about it. The WCB process is intended to be operated by people who are not lawyers. They have an appeals body that specifically helps you to advocate before the Appeals Commission. All of those things are in place, and I think that those are incredibly important things, particularly when you're talking about people who may not have English as their first language, who may not have extensive amounts of education, who may not be super familiar with even the sort of basics of Canadian law or Canadian society and are therefore not in the strongest position to advocate for themselves.

You know, I've said this before, but the concern I have with allowing private insurance is, again, that it's not even the farmer on whose farm the accident occurred that gets to make the decision. If an employee is injured and they want to seek compensation, the insurance company literally, under their contract, has the right to step into the shoes of the insured person and take carriage of the claim. That means that even if the farmer may want the insurance to pay out, they don't have to. The insurance company can make the decision to litigate the matter in court. Sometimes this can take years and years and years, and for an injured worker who's potentially not able to work, who has no funds to access, who is probably struggling to have a place to live and food, let alone keep up with this litigation, that's incredibly challenging. I'm not in a position to fix that problem because that would interfere with the substance of the bill.

I am, however, in a position to move an amendment that I think at least somewhat improves this. I will keep one copy so I can read it and wait for it to hit the table.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member. If you could please just read it into the record and then continue with your remarks.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. On behalf of Ms Gray I move that Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, be amended in section 1(3) in the proposed part 0.1 in section 1.2 in subsection 1(a) by adding “, subject to subsection (3)” after “authorized by the regulations” and by adding the following after subsection (2):

(3) For the purpose of subsection (1)(a), private insurance coverage must be of a type and amount that is equal to or exceeds the type and amount of coverage available under subsection 1(b).

What this does is that it basically ensures that any private insurance coverage that is purchased meets at least the same standards as WCB coverage would meet. I think the reason that this is again important is that it ensures that even though we're not dealing with no-fault insurance, at least if the individual is successful, if they prove their claim, they're able to get the same thing.

I do want to make something very clear on the record here, that by proposing this, I am by no means suggesting that everyone would not do it of their own volition. I suspect that many, I would venture without knowing, probably most would do this on their own. Most would do this because it's the right thing to do. In fact, we've heard stories from both sides of the House of many farmers and many farms that had coverage that exceeded what was necessary, so for most people this isn't going to create an issue. It just creates, essentially, a floor to ensure that everyone is operating on the same playing field, to ensure that there are rules around what we have to do instead of just taking it on faith. I think that that's important. What this will do is ensure that that coverage is in the same amount.

In the most tragic of circumstances we'd be dealing with the death of a worker, and this would ensure that their families get at least what they would have gotten under WCB, again assuming that the claim is proved. I think that's important. One of the reasons I think that's important is because not everyone has private life insurance. Life insurance is important. Everyone should get it. That's a very lawyer thing to say, but not everybody does have it. In fact, I think there's an increasing number of people who don't have private life insurance. This would ensure that if someone is killed at work, their family receives some compensation. I think that that's pretty important. I don't understand the compensation under WCB to be particularly rich, but it's something. It's something that allows that family to be able to get by, at least in the interim phase, so that at the same time that they're dealing with intense grief for the loss of their loved one, they're not also dealing with financial strain and financial burden and an inability to pay for somewhere to live.

I think this is an important amendment. I think that many out there, myself probably included, would say that it probably doesn't go far enough, but I do think it's better than nothing. I think it is an improvement over the current state of affairs, and I think that that's good, and I'm hopeful that the government will consider this amendment in the spirit in which it is intended to ensure that going forward, folks just have access to that minimum level of coverage. Again, I'm not proposing that this fixes all of my concerns with the bill, but I think it's something.

I think it's an important something because for an injured worker – and I've obviously dealt with a few – things are very challenging. Again, in my experience with them, they want to work, and they want to contribute to society, and they feel a strong desire to be earning income and taking care of their family and taking care of themselves. I think that's the case for most people. When somebody gets injured, that tends to affect them, obviously, financially, but it also affects them emotionally, and it affects them emotionally because they want to be able to provide. A lot of people have a lot of their self-worth sort of tied up in that. Just at this moment when the individual is struggling, we want to make sure that there are some rules in place in terms of how much compensation they're able to get. I think that ultimately that is incredibly important, and I think it's a positive step that we can take towards protecting these workers.

With that, I will close my comments on the amendment and urge all members to vote in favour of it.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry has risen to speak on amendment A1.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'd just like to explain why I won't be able to support these two amendments from the opposition. First off, I'd just like to address the previous speaker and the former Justice minister of the province when she was saying that when it comes to negotiation bargaining power, somehow lawyers are in a stronger negotiating position than farmers. I'd have to say that (a) I think that farmers and farm workers are actually stronger than lawyers in a lot of respects. When it comes to farm workers and their critical roles that they have at very sensitive times throughout the year, they have a tremendous amount of value on farms, and that's why farmers appreciate and treat farm workers so well here in the province of Alberta.

I just wanted to clarify that point and also bring to the attention of the House other exemptions of employment standards. A cross-jurisdictional scan that we've done: 4 out of 10 provinces have a family member exemption for employment standards; 9 out of 10 provinces here in Canada have a full exemption from overtime. When you go into specific provinces, our neighbour to the east, Saskatchewan, has employment standards that don't cover employees producing food on farms, ranches, or market gardens.

Manitoba has farm workers that are exempt from employment standards such as general holidays, hours of work, and overtime. I've listed off the many exemptions and examples of exemptions for minimum wage here in the province of Alberta. That goes from students to extras in a film or video production, again, with a large laundry list of other professions here in the province that are exempt from employment standards. I do think it's a very large stretch for the NDP to say that somehow farm workers shouldn't be under that category. They're under that category in other provinces as well as many other professions here in the province of Alberta.

The second part to their amendment on insurance, Mr. Chair. Throughout the consultation period this summer, when we talked to farmers from across the province, there was an apples-and-oranges comparison to private worker insurance. That's something that – we had a unique opportunity here in the province of Alberta to actually have a comparison. Farmers knew what it was like prior to 2015, prior to the previous government forming government. They had private worker insurance, and the market had developed worker insurance products that actually worked for specific farms, for specific types of farms, and also for specific farm workers.

When the NDP brought in Bill 6 and there were mandatory WCB premiums that were put on all farms, you had a hodgepodge of different farmers saying: "Okay. I guess I'll pay two insurance premiums just because I have to due to the red tape and the extra burden of Bill 6, but I really want to keep my private worker insurance because it benefits me, and it also benefits my workers. It covers them off work. If they go skiing, for example, and they break their leg," which I've actually done, "they would get coverage off the work site." You had other farmers that actually said, "No; well, I will cancel my private worker insurance, and I will go to WCB," which ticked off both the farmers and the farm worker because they preferred their private worker insurance.

Ultimately, this bill, Bill 26, will give a choice in worker insurance so that the farmer and the farm worker can sit down and they can decide: what is the best type of insurance policy, worker insurance policy, that specifically fits a farm? I think that's a Canadian first. I think that choice in insurance is something that is a great thing and one of the very strong aspects of Bill 26.

This NDP amendment: I would not be able to support it, Mr. Chair, but am happy to hear more opinions and debate on it throughout the day. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to amendment A1?

Ms Ganley: I would move that we adjourn debate on this matter.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Chair: Shall progress on Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, be reported when the committee rises? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: That is carried.

Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has risen.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much for the opportunity to address this bill. I think it's perhaps the second time I've been able to do this, and I do want to say that there are many possible consequences to supporting this bill, and that's why I'm not supporting it, Mr. Chair. I will try and illuminate members opposite with regard to some of my concerns to the bill as I talk through some of the aspects of it.

Mr. Chair, Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, purports to address many things, including tuition costs, student loans, electricity bills, seniors' hardship issues. It talks about, of course, hardship for Albertans who rely on disability income supports. I don't say that it does this effectively or positively for any of these issues that I'm addressing.

One issue that I do want to bring up off the bat as a result of having met with a bunch of young student physicians just yesterday. They identified the concern with this bill around – they believed it would attack their rights as doctors to work where they wanted to in this province once they graduated. They came and explained to me that Bill 21 really ratchets down where they can practise as a result of billing numbers not being given to doctors in certain areas of the province. They felt that that would be a drain on the numbers of graduate doctors who are coming out of med schools.

I asked them, you know: what's the impact on your current class? There are about 140 to 160 students in classes. Calgary has three years of classes of med students, and the University of Alberta has four years of classes, so about 160 students in each of those three- or four-year programs. They said that a significant number of their classmates are starting to be concerned and talk about going elsewhere because of this very bill that's before us. I know they met with the Minister of Health and shared that same concern with the Minister of Health, and I can tell you that they met with the opposition MLAs. We heard them out.

[Mr. Jones in the chair]

I would have to say that I'm very, very concerned that we will be training young doctors but that once they graduate, they'll look to other provinces to practise in the fields that they wish to practise in because of the restrictive policies in Bill 21 on them. It's obviously not a really good thing to happen. The investment that Alberta is making in their training, I would suggest, is tens and tens and tens of thousands of dollars for each of those students. As we know, they want to practise in the areas that they're studying, but if they're not able to do that and get billing numbers in those areas, then they will leave, Mr. Chair, and leaving is the last thing we want to see happen. They said also that this has been constitutionally challenged, and it has been upheld in terms of their ability to practise where they wish, so they just don't see the benefit of Alberta going down the same road and losing students in the meantime.

I do want to focus a little bit on something that I think is a tragedy for the most vulnerable in our province, particularly seniors and AISH recipients and income support recipients and families that set up Henson trusts. Earlier today we heard the Minister of Seniors and Housing address the issue of the lack of being able to in this budget support seniors who are going for testing for their licences. It's covered at this point in time and has been by the NDP government and probably by the PC governments before that. It has been covered in terms of their health insurance costs for that test, doctors testing to make sure that they continue to be adequately fit to operate a motor vehicle in this province. That's being removed by this bill before us, Mr. Chair. So the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, is actually making life more difficult for seniors in our province who are mandatorily tested for licensing after the age of 80.

More broadly, we see the deindexing of seniors' programs in this province as a result of this bill being brought forward, which again makes life more difficult for Albertans who are seniors. I think my colleague for Edmonton-Riverview said it correctly, you know, that it's all in service of giving a large corporate handout of $4.7 billion. Seniors are wearing that in part, Mr. Chair, along with many other vulnerable populations.

Additionally, the deindexing of AISH: I want to just spend a few minutes talking about that because, again, I think that that's a tragedy to affect this province. AISH recipients, of which there are about 57,000 in this province, were going to receive their first increment after being indexed from 2015 to 2019 by the previous government, the NDP government, so their benefit had risen, but their first indexed rise in benefit was to be January 1, 2020, and this Bill 21 is eliminating that. As a result of addressing this, the Premier said prior that he didn't believe the elimination of this indexing would be onerous on people who receive AISH, but I would argue differently.

I met an individual who said that, you know, AISH was obviously his sole income and that it keeps him in his apartment. If there's any change in his status as a result of apartment rents going up, he may in fact be having to move to a cheaper place, less suitable for his needs as he's not well. The deindexing of this AISH payment is something that touches not only 57,000 people but their families. It touches our reputation as a province, Mr. Chair, where we are, again, looking to some of the most vulnerable, financially insecure people in this province to pay for the $4.7 billion corporate handout that is going to wealthy corporations.

Of course, that's not the only recipient of income supports that is being deindexed. I talked about seniors' benefits. I talked about AISH recipients. I want to focus now on people who receive Alberta Works supports, those who have basic employment supports. There's one other file under Alberta Works that will be similarly deindexed after January 1. You know, these are not substantive monthly supports that people get, but they're going to not receive the consumer price index or the portion of it that was planned for them on January 1.

My colleague talked a lot about the Henson trusts. As we know, we put that in place as a result of advocacy from people who have loved ones who are disabled and want to ensure their long-term enjoyment and quality of life and put monies away. We made sure that those folks would be able to enjoy that trust as an estate planning tool and not see it be eaten away by the policies that were previously in place. We did that, and the removal of that is obviously not something that's going to assist those individuals.

I just want to move on to a few other things that are in this that look like they're going to be problematic for many people in Alberta, and those are cuts to policing and other municipal taxes being hiked. I come from Calgary. I have heard long and hard about the changes to the fine revenues that will make our police service less robust, less boots on the street, as a result of taking a larger portion of the fine revenues that are identified in this Bill 21. Certainly, I heard from many RMA members at the conference I attended with regard to the changes that that will have in their communities and the concern they have going forward if there is not some way of coming up with a solution that involves them in the decision of that solution that they can live with.

I would encourage, of course, members of the government to keep listening to those members, those local politicians from counties and municipal districts because at the local level they have the skills, the abilities, and they understand their situations. Omnibus bills like this, that bring 19 pieces of legislation into place and create one piece of new legislation, are not something as transparent as you would hope. We need to kind of do a better job of explaining what exactly is in these bills for our colleagues who are working at the local level and, of course, want to make sure that their communities are sustainable as they go forward. Without that agreement, without that ability, they really are shooting blind and are having to deal with whatever comes down on them. That's not partnership, Mr. Chair. That's something a lot less than partnership.

The 19 pieces of legislation in one new piece of legislation cover everything from the Health Care Insurance Act to the Housing Act, the Utilities Commission Act. I talked at length about the Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped Act. Of course, the regulated cap on electricity rates is coming off as well. I listened to a radio report this morning which talked about where those prices are going in the future, and they were significantly higher than the cap that was put in place by the NDP government.

I want to focus a little bit on the Post-secondary Learning Act. That act, of course, is going to address the issues with regard to tuition. I was recently at a rally where students were present, and they talked about the challenges they believe they'll have as young people trying to complete their postsecondary education, which, we all know, is the key to a better job in life. If their postsecondary education gets expensive, then they may take other avenues or jobs or make other decisions instead of staying involved with postsecondary education. A 7 per cent increase per year for the next three years: compounded that'll be about a 23 per cent increase on that education from today to the future.

I went through a couple of degrees, and both times when I did that, I was able to enjoy not only loans but grants from the institutions and the governments, both in Ontario and here. That was a very different time, you know, when we were able to afford our whole education based on those two incomes, grants and loans, and then supplement that with summer work, summer jobs. Students are less and less able to make that happen for themselves. They rely on a lot more loans, and they have to pay those back. Of course, in this bill those loans are going up, cost plus 1 per cent, which will mean that postsecondary education is even more expensive. Then, on the other side, with less money going to postsecondary institutions from this government in other budget lines, we know that those institutions will be finding other ways to jack up the costs of those programs for their students.

Mr. Chair, all in all, this Bill 21, again, is a problem on many levels. It creates greater hardship for seniors in this province, it creates greater hardship for students at the postsecondary and college levels in this province, and if you're a person on disability income supports, you're going to be receiving less money going forward from this government with regard to deindexing. Just on deindexing, you know, for weeks since the budget has come out, I've listened to various ministers talk about how the benefit remains the same: there's no difference; what are you concerned about? You know, when you parse that answer, the benefit may be the same as the benefit last year, but with the deindexing it's less of a benefit going forward. But that's never kind of acknowledged.

It's somewhat disingenuous to really listen to members on the other side when they say: "Nothing has changed. Everything is the same. You're reading this wrong." I don't believe Albertans are reading it wrong, Mr. Chair. I believe Albertans can read black and white. As my colleagues so many times have pointed out in question period, Albertans can read exactly what's in Bill 21 though it is an omnibus bill and very confusing. It ensures fiscal sustainability on the backs of those different groups that I've mentioned. It would be great if members on the other side would just admit that, but they continue not to.

Right from students who are currently in school to young doctors who are finishing their schooling, everything in this bill is a problem for Albertans that will come home to roost in the near future. Albertans will see this bill for what it is. It's an endeavour to ensure fiscal sustainability on the backs of Albertans who are least able to advocate for themselves. We are here as an opposition to do that advocacy. We've been tabling letters, we've been tabling petitions, all to say that there are problems with this, and we need to have that on the record. I've put it on the record at least a couple of times.

I think, you know, the thing that I was most proud of going forward was the work we did.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen to speak.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to Bill 21. Looking at Bill 21 and the possible consequences of the changes this bill proposes, it doesn't seem like I will be able to support this bill anyway. In reading the name of the bill, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, and under this bill the changes for students, you know, and people on AISH, it seems like this bill is going to probably result in more austerity than sustainability for Albertans. Under Bill 21 the government is proposing changes to the tuition fees and tuition fee increases.

I will put the changes into perspective and look at the patterns that we are working in the House to address on the issues of everyday Albertans. The government has already rolled back youth worker wages, which has hit their ability big time to save for their higher education.

Through this bill the government is also proposing to cancel the STEP program. This is the second-biggest, I will say, adverse effect on very young people. They will be out of work. The STEP program was very effectively helping, supporting young people to find jobs that would help them to save, you know, money for the things they would probably need for school or to help them save the money they will need for tuition for higher education at the institutions.

Even in looking at the very first of the changes in this omnibus bill, I will say that this bill has mixed up a number of things to confuse people. This is one of the changes out of the 70 changes this bill proposes, and it is enough for me to oppose the bill. It is going to affect these very young people: removing the tuition fee cap. I still remember – I can't forget – those comments the Minister of Advanced Education made in the House, that this was something that was never a concern of the students in universities or the students, you know, pursuing higher education. This is very ridiculous. It was not that long ago, I think a week ago, that we saw thousands of people from the two educational institutions in Edmonton. They came to the Legislature, to the Legislature steps. They opposed the government's changes, and they were willing to meet with the government and share the pain and suffering they're going through and the bad impact this bill is going to cause.

I was sad to see that none of the government members of the House dared or had the courage to go out and speak to those young people that were braving the very cool weather on that day. That is one of the biggest reasons why I think that not only myself but every single person in the House thinks education is a fundamental right of people, that this has to be protected. This bill is going to have quite an adverse effect. It's very hard.

I still remember one of the conversations I wanted to bring into the discussion. During my campaign, when I was door-knocking, there was a person that would really not be convinced by whatever I would say, but as soon as, you know, I discussed the cuts in education and all of the things, he remembered. He jumped on it and stole the opportunity from me to speak. He agreed that Alberta hasn't even recovered from the Klein cuts to the education and health systems – and this is very important – and this is how he committed his support to me on that day.

This is concerning to Albertans. This is also concerning to the people in my riding. You know, the feedback on the government's budget, on the changes being proposed by the government like the Bill 21 changes to tuition, the changes to student loans: the responses and feedback from the people in my riding are flooding in. I'm receiving e-mails and written letters, and people are coming to my office to see me and give their feedback personally. I still have hundreds of e-mails. I will probably see if I will be able to table those responses from very concerned constituents in my riding. I will see if I will be able to table those responses. That is my responsibility, and I will try to table them, hopefully tomorrow. That is the biggest concern.

Other big changes are being proposed. I don't know what measures and what homework and what sources and what kind of consultation the government is doing in proposing these kinds of changes in the bill. I'm surprised to see that the government dared to propose deindexing the benefits to the AISH recipients, the very people that are severely handicapped and totally dependent on someone for their life 24/7. The benefits they receive are not even enough to afford the basic, basic necessities of their lives. If you take this into consideration, that the people depend on it in their daily lives, if you take some form of compensation into consideration, receiving the help they depend on, there's no way that you can say that the benefits they're receiving – there's more to do for them.

I just wanted to discuss one more experience I had with someone in my riding. The person was literally crying, you know. He said that he has to come up with and pay $1,000-plus out of $1,685, the approximate benefit he's receiving right now. He said that the rent for his place is more than $1,000, and on top of that, after taking care of the electricity bill and the other utility bills, all those things, there's nothing left sometimes in the month to buy groceries. People have to choose between keeping a roof over their head or putting food on the table. This is a very serious situation. I think the government should have done some more work on this before proposing, actually, to deindex the AISH benefits to very vulnerable people.

That is the other thing. I would even offer to the government to – you know, probably not. I oppose this bill. They probably need to consult the stakeholders and the AISH recipients and to evaluate the real situation they are going through, that they are suffering in their day-to-day lives and expecting more from the government. That was one of the issues when I was running in the last election. I committed to those people that I will represent their issues on their behalf in the House, and I'm very proud to stand in the House on behalf of those needy people and say that this cannot be supported at all. I, on the contrary, urge, even at this stage, the people of this House to do meaningful work in the House. You need to do more consultation, and you need to get more information. You need to roll back the proposals you are offering in this Bill 21.

There are proposals in the bill related to doctors, where it says that the bill will give more power to the minister in issuing a certificate number, and he will also be able to decide where the new doctors can further practise and where they cannot practise. It might have been proposed with some good faith – I'll just give the benefit of doubt on this – but I come from experience, and you can see the unintended consequences. By the time it's passed, it does not have to be, you know, practised the same way that the government might have done. In the broad end, thinking of that, it is going to probably help solve some of the issues the government has in their mind.

These kinds of changes have been very, very controversial and give such a lot of power to the ministry and the people who are well connected to the ministry or to, I would say, the authorities. These kinds of laws have become more to pick and choose people, more to sometimes penalize those people who you don't get along with, who you don't like, or sometimes penalize your opponents and create wedges. In many cases it became the reason for growing corruption in many places. I will still say that this bill was probably put forward with very good faith, but this can lead us to some very unintended consequences. The government really needs to reconsider this change and needs to do more work and more consultation and give more time if they want to move on and change something like this.

The other thing I just wanted to bring into the intention is that life is already becoming harder and harder, and this is even harder due to the province. We all acknowledge that we are going through a tough time. People are having a hard time finding a job. There are more people out of work these days than when the UCP came into government seven months ago. Inflation is still growing. The changes to the electricity law might also affect the living standards of the people and will also probably make their living standard more costly. With living standard costs growing steadily, if not rapidly, I would say, the government needs to support the more vulnerable communities. They should not actually put more burdens on them. The government has taken a big, open-hearted step based on their ideology that their giveaway to big corporations was going to bring in a number of jobs. The amount of something in hand was considerable; $4.7 billion is not a small amount of money.

Government open-heartedly decided based on a few of the economists they wanted to rely on and believe, even though the vast majority of people opposed it. A number of facts were discussed and tabled in the House, that these kinds of practices have been, you know, experienced in many parts of the world and just even close to our country, close to our province, south of the border as well. But none of the places really see any, you know, positive outcome out of this.

On the one hand, the government, you know, showed this big heart based on some philosophical beliefs; not signing the agreement, not signing the contracts but just based on their philosophical beliefs. But on the other hand, the government is going after those very vulnerable people, going after $20 a month on those people. You know, that makes a huge difference to those people, and I still wonder what the government is going to achieve out of this, by proposing these moves, but the only thing we are sure of – and this is obvious – is that it will make their lives harder and make their lives worse.

Also, the changes to the seniors. These people also, you know, are already living with very limited means, so the changes to the seniors by deindexing seniors' programs is going to make their lives harder. The people, the community that's already living with very, very limited means – I can share an example. I did discuss this ...

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21, the so-called Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. It's interesting, the title of this piece of legislation. The government wants us to believe that by implementing this legislation in conjunction with the rest of their budget, they're ensuring the fiscal sustainability of the finances of the province of Alberta, but of course nothing could be further from the truth. We see that the deficit for this year is $1.5 billion higher than it would have been had we brought down a budget this year, and the government is still on track to rack up $100 billion worth of debt in the near future. It's quite clear that the government is not actually all that concerned about ensuring fiscal sustainability in any meaningful sense, so I think that the name of this bill is a misnomer.

What I do think is going on here, though, is that the government is ensuring the fiscal sustainability of its friends and donors while making fiscal sustainability for the people that are going to pay for those friends' and donors' gifts have a harder time making ends meet, Mr. Chair. You know, we've asked ourselves the questions, and certainly my constituents have come to me saying: "Why is this government balancing the books or attempting to balance the books on the backs of students and people on AISH and people receiving income supports, learner supports, seniors who need seniors' benefits? Why is the government making those people pay while they're giving a $4.7 billion handout to their wealthy friends and donors?" My response to them is: that's the point. This is a government that is governing for the wealthy classes and is taking advantage of the lack of power of those that are under attack here in this bill to be able to transfer wealth to the government's wealthy friends and donors.

If you look at the list of people who are negatively affected by this bill, Mr. Chair, it's quite clear that the government is intentionally attacking people that they think either won't fight back or can't fight back. Or, you know, there is another class of people, I think, that the government is taking advantage of. This is a group of people that will support them regardless of what the government does to them or regardless of what other government policies are going on. Certainly, there is a move to make sure with some of the changes that are being made, that are transferring wealth from the average Albertan to the wealthy corporate donors that prop up this government, that the government can dodge accountability.

I want to go through those in order, Mr. Chair. Certainly, we see, first of all, in this bill that one of the groups of people that's being attacked, because they don't have the power to fight back and the consequences for this government are low, is students. We know that all of the polling shows and certainly from my own discussions, people who are of the age for going to university or college are certainly left-leaning and far more likely to support our party in an election than the members opposite. There's nothing that the UCP can probably do that would bring those people on board with them, so there is little electoral consequence that these members think that they'll have to pay for attacking students the way the have in this piece of legislation: raising tuition by 23 per cent over four years, hiking the interest rates on their student loans. It's quite clear, Mr. Chair, that the UCP thinks that by attacking students, they won't have to face any electoral consequences.

I'll maybe take issue with that. I know that we saw quite a few hundred students on the steps of the Legislature here not too long ago pushing for the government to back away from these decisions, and I'm sure, Mr. Chair, that's not the last that we're going to hear from students. I would remind students that even though they are besieged by a whole overwhelming suite of responsibilities – they're working jobs to make ends meet; they've got incredible demands on their time with respect to homework and classes, extracurricular activities, those kinds of things – students do have the power to fight back.

We've seen student movements affect significant change in other jurisdictions around the world. Certainly, Chile is going through a time of significant change thanks in no small part to the activism and collective action of students in that country. I think that once students wake up to realize how much power they hold collectively here in this province, they will start to exercise that power and will begin to act to make sure that this government backs away from some of these decisions. Certainly, students will have my support in whatever expression of that power they choose to use against this government.

The next group of people that are under attack in this legislation is seniors. Of course, we see that the seniors' benefit is being cut next year. I think probably, if I had to guess why the government is picking on seniors in this bill, it's because they're taking seniors for granted. They think that no matter what this government does, seniors will more likely vote for Conservatives than for anybody else in the provincial election. Mr. Chair, they're taking advantage of that fact so that they can find these reductions in Alberta seniors' benefits and transfer that money to their billionaire supporters and donors.

I think the government is overplaying its hand. I don't think they are right in taking advantage of the support of seniors like this. The seniors that I've talked to in my constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar – and I have a lot of them, Mr. Chair. Edmonton-Gold Bar has one of the highest populations of seniors of any riding in the province. Certainly, seniors did support members opposite in the last election, but that support is quickly evaporating because of moves like this to slash seniors' benefits next year in addition to kicking thousands of their partners and dependants off of the seniors' drug plan in addition to the other attacks that my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Riverview has outlined repeatedly in this debate as well as in her questions to the Minister of Seniors and Housing.

They're also attacking people who rely on disability income supports. So that's AISH recipients, but it's not just AISH recipients. It's people who receive income support to supplement their income in cases where they can't work or they're having difficulty finding work or they're going back to school to get the education that they need to get a better job. Those are people, Mr. Chair, who have a hard time advocating for themselves, standing up for themselves. It's quite clear to me that this government is targeting them because the government perceives that they don't have the capacity to fight back and stand up for themselves.

I think that again, just like with seniors, the government is overplaying its hand here. I've got a lot of AISH recipients and people on income supports who have never voted before, Mr. Chair. But these kinds of cuts, these kinds of cruel cuts that are made, shifting money that should rightfully go into their pockets into the pockets of people like Murray Edwards and Nancy Southern, are absolutely offensive to them. When the next election rolls around, these people are going to come out and make their voices heard, and they are going to stand up for themselves. I think the government will come to regret the day that they brought this legislation forward because it has really aroused a political interest that hasn't been there for a lot of these people for a long time, if ever.

Certainly, we've also seen the government think that it's a good idea to attack doctors and medical students with restrictions on practice IDs. Again, Mr. Chair, I think that the government assumes that because med students are busy with their studies and their clinical placements and all of their learning, they don't have the time or the capacity to speak up against this government's unconstitutional move to restrict practice IDs. I think we certainly heard loudly and clearly from the medical students who visited us yesterday that that's not true. These medical students have more than enough ability to understand what's going on and are marshalling the resources that they have to push back against this government as well.

Doctors, of course, are another group that's under attack. This one strikes me as incredible hubris on the part of the members opposite. I can't think of a group of people in Alberta who wield more power than doctors, and why the members opposite insist on attacking doctors and related health care professionals – it's not just in this bill. We see them attacking the work of doctors in the conscience rights bill that was brought forward by the Member for Peace River. That certainly caught doctors' attention. They didn't like that. There were 176 doctors who wrote a letter, as published in the Edmonton Journal, speaking out against that.

Doctors see the pattern that's going on here. It's not just the Member for Peace River in an isolated attempt to legislate conscience rights. It's not just this piece of legislation that seeks to terminate the agreement with doctors at a moment's notice. They see the pattern here that this government is establishing of attacking health care, and they are also pushing back. I have to say that, you know, why the government thinks that it has the mandate to attack doctors the way it has is beyond me. But I can guarantee you, Mr. Chair, that that is a fight that this government is absolutely bound to lose.

We have here a number of changes in Bill 21 related to municipal funding. They're going to cut the amount of fines that are available to municipalities, and that's going to result in either service reductions or tax hikes at the municipal level, possibly both in some municipalities. That's a tax hike that the members opposite can dodge accountability on quite easily. We've seen the Member for Edmonton-South West try to dodge accountability for the tax hikes already, this morning even, when we were debating Bill 29, because it's not his job to tell municipalities how to run their budgets. I guess it is his job to cut their funding and make it harder for them to make ends meet. But if there are service reductions or tax hikes that result because of those funding reductions, well, that's the municipality's fault. They can't be held responsible for the choices that mayors and councils all over the province have to make, which is remarkable, Mr. Chair.

We hear time and again from the members opposite that part of being a Conservative means taking personal responsibility for things; yet at every turn this group of Conservatives here in this House refuses to accept responsibility for anything. The economy goes down? It's Trudeau's fault. Can't get a pipeline built? Foreign-funded environmental activists. Municipal tax hikes? Well, that's city council's fault. Teachers being fired? Send in the auditors to audit the school board because the government can't be held responsible. You know, I wish that the members opposite would actually live according to what they profess to believe and start taking personal accountability for the decisions that they're making, rather than trying to dodge accountability and blame others for what's going on.

Finally, we see some measures to attack the power of organized labour: making some significant changes to the collective bargaining process, repealing the essential services replacement worker ban. Mr. Chair, of course, that's all part of a broader pattern that we've seen over the last however long. How long have we been here? It's only been seven months; it feels like seven years at times. You know, we've seen restricting bargaining rights in Bill 9 earlier in this session, we've seen the farm labour bill eliminating the ability of farm workers to unionize, and now in this bill we have changes to the collective bargaining process and eliminating the replacement worker ban on essential workers.

The reason that this government is so intent on attacking labour unions is because labour unions have real power to fight back against this government. We saw it with the CN Rail strike. On the first day of the CN Rail strike the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake was demanding that the federal government legislate the people back to work, not because he's genuinely interested in the well-being of the nation but because this threatens his agenda. The other labour unions that exist in this province also threaten this government's agenda, and that's why they're using every legislative trick in the book to take away their power.

But I can tell you, Mr. Chair, that working people in this province are having none of it. I have never seen a level of worker unrest as we are seeing right now. You know, the Member for Calgary-Lougheed appears to be taking it lightly. When 2,000 people show up to protest his annual general meeting in Calgary, he welcomes it.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul has risen to speak.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. You know, a couple of times today and just recently from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar we've heard mention of foreign-funded environmental activists. During question period we were basically accused of falling for conspiracy theories.

You know, I spent a couple of minutes here in the last hour. It doesn't take you very long to dig up some information. One of these fellows – the man's name is Michael Marx – started a group called CorpEthics, who started the Tar Sands Campaign that we hear so much about. Strangely enough, he's got very, very close ties to a lady named Tzeporah Berman, who was appointed by the previous government to the OSAG panel. Actually, both Tzeporah Berman and Michael Marx were presidents of the same organization at one time.

I'd just like to read you a couple of excerpts from a couple of the things that I'll be tabling tomorrow. The CorpEthics history says, "In 2008, CorpEthics became engaged in the North American Tar Sands Campaign." It goes on further in that same paragraph and says, "The campaign successfully blocked all major proposed pipelines, most notably when President Obama rejected the proposed Keystone XL pipeline." This isn't a conspiracy. This is right off the man's own website, and you're the ones that are promoting this stuff.

You know, at one time I talked about comparing these folks to Stampede Wrestling when they talk about their fight for Alberta.

An Hon. Member: Great show. I love that show.

Mr. Hanson: Yeah. It was great. But we all knew the fix was in, right?

Ms Ganley: A point of order, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I hear a point of order has been called.

Point of Order Relevance

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I think this has been a very long session, and I think, you know, we're all entitled to express our opinions, but I think we're here today to talk about Bill 21. The hon. member hasn't even so much as sort of attempted to make his comments about Bill 21. I think perhaps if I could ask the chair to intervene and direct him back to the subject at hand. I believe his comments are intended, under 23(h), (i), and (j), to provoke disorder and have no other relevance to this bill.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I'm prepared to rule. I think that in this case there's been a wide swath with regard to debate on all parties and all members. I would, however, taking into account the statements from the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, just ask that the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul bring it towards the bill at hand. I assume that that's coming.

Mr. Hanson: Absolutely. Mr. Chair, I'm simply in the manner of debate, in the classic form of debate, responding to comments made by somebody else that spoke for 20 minutes closely related to Bill 21. I don't know, but you know, just responding. He's the one that brought up that we were – basically accusing us of conspiracy theories in response to foreign-funded environmental activists that affect our ability to raise funds in this province. Royalties are a big part of it. Sustainability under Bill 21 would be closely related to royalties. I think protecting our oil and gas industry, which they failed to do for four years, is a matter of debate, and I think definitely falls under the purview of Bill 21.

I would just like to carry on with the same Michael Marx that they get so excited when I talk about apparently, a PhD, but he also talks under the Tar Sands Campaign. It's a 17-page item that I'll be tabling tomorrow for the benefit of the members opposite. They can actually read about the folks that they support. You know, perhaps they should educate themselves. Just some key words that come out like "non-conventional fuels, like tar sands oil from Canada . . . Stopping the flow of tar sands oil now, as well as other non-conventional fossil fuels."

Ms Ganley: Mr. Chair, I'm sorry. If I could just interject one more time.

The Deputy Chair: I just want to be clear on what we are interjecting about here, because he has the call. If you stand, that doesn't necessarily give you the right to be called.

Ms Ganley: Point of order.

The Deputy Chair: Point of order? Absolutely. Let's hear it.

Point of Order Relevance

Ms Ganley: Once again, if the member could even refer us to the section of the bill that he's presently discussing, I would be happy to entertain his comments, Mr. Chair, but I believe the comments are really just intended to inflame matters in the House. I don't think that that's enormously helpful. I would be happy to resume my place if we could even know what section of the bill we're talking about.

The Deputy Chair: I'm happy to rule. I think that it has been made clear, though, that the hon. member is relating his comments to comments that were made previously in this House. I don't think that it would be within my purview to actually make the hon. member refer to a specific section when I think that it's within the realm of debate on all sides, all members, to talk about bills in general as well.

If the hon. member could please continue. However, I would say that if he could please try to relate it as best as possible, obviously, to Bill 21, because I'm sure that's what you were doing here.

Mr. Hanson: Actually, you know, Mr. Chair, we've sat here and listened to hours and hours of debate. It's drifted off into tangents that, you know, we've sat quietly and allowed it to go through. We've been . . . [interjections] Here we go. I've obviously struck a nerve, and I think that's probably enough for one day being that it's this close to supertime.

I'll just continue to, you know, talk about the Tar Sands Campaign. I can read out a few more things. I do believe that it definitely ties into Bill 21, which is the sustainability of our province. Royalties are a big part of it. The Municipal Affairs minister is nodding his head. Like, we get a lot of our money in this province from royalties, and have. It's been very beneficial to our province for very, very many years, 56 years at least.

The idea that talking about a campaign to shut down our oil and gas industry, that the other folks support with their Leap Manifesto sign-ons – it becomes very clear when you read this. It becomes very clear when you read the Tar Sands Campaign strategy, where they try to influence governments and infiltrate governments. That's exactly what's happened here in Alberta over the last four years, and I think it's an embarrassment.

I'll be tabling this tomorrow for everyone to read. Anybody that wants a copy, I'd be happy to give it to them. It has obviously struck a nerve with the Leap Manifesto crowd next to me, so I'll just call it a night and take my seat.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any hon. members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has risen.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm certainly proud to rise in this place. I wish we could be speaking of things that I think are more beneficial, but tonight we're going to talk about what the government is doing in this bill, Bill 21, to limit access to health care. That seems to be a bit of a theme. We've seen it earlier this week, or actually I guess it was late last week, when notification went out to health care workers that there will be 5,100 less of them very early in the new year, and that's with regard to nurses, registered nurses as well as LPNs, health care aides, paramedics, OTs, PTs, you name it. This government is significantly underfunding health care; education, too, but in this regard health care.

The latest attack in this bill is around medical graduates, medical students, through the controlling of prac IDs, the physician practitioner IDs, that have been the long-standing practice in this province of how physicians receive payment for the services that they provide. Whether they specialize in family medicine or oncology or any other field, whether they practise in Edmonton or Edson, they all have a prac ID. Some are on ARPs; some are fee for service. While this government could be focusing on ways to improve public health care and make sure that it is actually going to be long-term sustainable for future generations, instead they seem set on limiting the access to doctors for folks in this province.

Many people say: well, this has been tried in other jurisdictions. They're right. It has been tried in other jurisdictions. When British Columbia tried it, there was significant push-back from the medical association. It didn't start with the doctors pushing back, though, it started with the students pushing their medical association and later the medical association taking it to court and eventually winning. But what happened in the meantime, I would say, was devastating to health care in British Columbia. What happened in the larger urban centres in particular is that . . .

Mr. Hanson: Point of order.

The Deputy Chair: I will give the floor to the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul on this point of order.

Point of Order Relevance

Mr. Hanson: Well, Mr. Chair, I just got called on relevance to what I was talking about. Now the member is talking about things that are happening in British Columbia.

The Deputy Chair: I'm prepared to rule on this matter. I think that the hon. member will remember that though you were called on a point of order, there was not a point of order found at that time. So given the wide berth on some of the discussions that have gone here, I think that given what the ruling was previously as well, I would say there is no point of order or that I don't find one, but I would ask the hon. member to make sure that she ties it to Bill 21.

Please continue.

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. Happily. Part 1.1 physician resource planning, section 28.1(1), page 5 of the hard copy, for the hon. member's awareness, since he doesn't seem to be aware of what the bill is actually influencing on communities, including communities in northern Alberta.

Back to the British Columbia lived experience that this government seems dead set on imposing here in Alberta. In the larger urban centres what happened is that when physicians were retiring, they were essentially able to sell their practices to folks who were willing and able to pay for the access to be able to practise in those communities, which meant that already established physicians were able to capitalize on the lack of the free market that members so often on the other side say will solve all the world's problems, but here they are imposing some of the most severe market restraints on physicians in this province that I think we have seen anywhere in Canada. So British Columbia is one example. They want to talk about the free market. Let's look at what happened there when prac IDs were rolled back in this way. That was one example.

Quebec: very similar initiative rulings there through the courts. Yes, this bill will be very, very busy good times for lawyers because, certainly, this is infringing on a number of individual rights and liberties. In Quebec what happened was that the physicians, again, spent time in the courts, and the government there learned that they have to balance the carrot with the stick, right? They can't just force folks into employment situations that infringe on their mobility and their ability to practise in other areas, that there have to be some incentives. In Quebec one that has worked quite well is that there is incentive pay or disincentive pay, depending on which way you want to look at it, for folks who choose to practise in areas where the government might not want to be incenting them to practise quite so much.

Another one, of course, that likes to be referred to is New Brunswick. New Brunswick is probably the most current case. It wasn't the courts that in the end said it was ineffective. Although there was time spent in the courts, for sure, it was the Minister of Health in New Brunswick, Mr. Chair, who said that it certainly wasn't effective and that it wasn't achieving the outcomes. Rather, what was happening – I've got a nice quote here, so I'll just read it. The New Brunswick Minister of Health said: "The physician billing number system no longer works for the province. It is flawed because it restricts the number of physicians practising, restricts the mobility of physicians and impedes recruitment." I'll be happy to provide that tabling tomorrow and the reference for Hansard.

What the government is doing has been tried and tested in other jurisdictions. Either the courts or the system itself has proven that it hasn't been effective. Yesterday there were a number of med students here both from the U of A and U of C. We had the opportunity to meet with them, and they are very deeply concerned about the attack on their profession and their professionalism and their ability to live, work, and play in the province in places of their choosing. When I asked them for a show of hands of who plans on practising in Alberta, almost everyone put their hand up.

I said: "Show of hands. Who would like to be able to choose to live, for example, in Edmonton or Calgary, where they're currently living." The majority put their hand up. Now, not all did, because some would really like to be able to return to their hometowns. For example, if you're somebody who grew up in the area that the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul just referred to and you wanted to return to your geographic region, and you'd had a dream of serving as a doctor in Bonnyville because that's a community that you grew up in and that you'd like to serve in your career, but the government decides that, no, you can't – it isn't even about wanting to practise rural medicine. Maybe it's about wanting to practise rural medicine in your hometown, and the government says: "No, you can't. That is not an option."

That's what we're debating here tonight in this bill. Bill 21 has a whole section dedicated to what is referred to as physician resource planning but really is the curtailment of doctors in communities throughout our province. We've had a history in the past of recruiting from out of province and sometimes even out of country, and especially in the north I know that there is a significant amount of recruitment. So interesting priorities, especially when we tell Alberta students: "No. We're going to control prac IDs. We're going to tell you where you can live and not live."

One other example I want to give you. One of the students yesterday talked about how by the time you're a doctor, you're usually a little bit more mature. You've had a little bit more life experience behind you, and many have partners. Many are married. Many are at a point in their life where their government imposing on them where to live could impact their personal relationships as well. One who lives in Calgary has a husband who works in oil and gas and wants to stay working for the company he's been working with in oil and gas. Worst-case scenario, which seems likely because it's in black and white in this bill: the government passes this, and that physician isn't able to practise in Calgary because she can't afford to buy an established practice and has to choose between her partner and her profession.

Some people say: well, there are lots of professions where people are told where to live and they are accommodated for that. One of the best examples that's been given to me was by somebody who was a med student, who had also been a paramedic and also been an active service member in the military, who said: when I was assigned somewhere, my husband was interviewed, and we were placed together, and he had guaranteed employment, and we had a system that supported us in integrating into that community.

What these med students went on to say is how concerned they were for their colleagues and for their patients. If people are assigned to communities, they will either go there feeling resentful, not feeling like it was a choice that they made, or they will choose to leave. They will choose to leave the province altogether. That is not something that they wanted to contemplate. When we're trying to encourage youth in this province to pursue a career in health, in the health sciences – and many will consider medicine – are we actually encouraging them to leave our province?

I hate to draw on the cynical part of me. When I read this bill and I see these failed practices from other jurisdictions being considered, I think, like: does the government actually want us to fail public health care? Does the government want to create a condition where people say, "Well, I'm fed up; I will pay out of pocket"? I seriously fear that that is the actual intention of this bill because when you look at the other case studies from other jurisdictions and you've seen how they failed and you talk to the people of this province who are directly impacted by this – I'm talking mostly about the students and, of course, the countless patients – I have very little other justification to give than: the government actually intentionally wants to create chaos in public health care, wants to intentionally invoke a system that has proven to have failed in other jurisdictions, and wants to create great distress for people in being able to access public health care.

I really wish that wasn't the case. I wish this wasn't about pushing a system that has failed in so many jurisdictions. But that is the section I've chosen to focus my comments on at this stage, at this reading here tonight. Certainly, there are many other flawed areas in this bill, but that is one that I think I have some particular recent experience in. I think it would be beneficial to all of us to really push back on what has proven to be ineffective and potentially illegal and, I think, actually, really infringes on what so many people say is a value that they hold around the free market. This certainly is the opposite of anything to do with the free market. This is about controlling and dictating where individuals, if they want to live in the province of Alberta, can live and work.

I think that there are other ways to incent the right type of outcomes in people choosing communities that need to be served or types of specialties that need to be served more. I think that one of the best ways you can do that is making sure that there are proper and adequate staffing levels for allied health and proper and adequate equipment and opportunities for people to practise to their fullest scope throughout the province. I don't think it's always all about money. I think a lot of it is about being able to live and fulfill the career dreams you had when somebody chooses a profession.

Those are the pieces I focused on at this stage, at this point. Certainly, there are a number of other flawed areas in this bill as well, but this is one that I think members on both sides of the House must be scratching their head about because certainly every case study in Canada has proven that this fails, that this is wrong, and that it is not something that we should be heading down the path of. I imagine that colleagues might want to ask the Health minister and the cabinet why it is that they're pushing for this model so aggressively when it's proven to fail.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen to speak.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Chair. You know, I have sat down here and listened to many of the contributions by the members opposite. I would like to focus on the comments made by the Member for Edmonton-Glenora as well as the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. You know, one of the last comments from the Member for Edmonton-Glenora was that it seems to her – and I'm paraphrasing – that this government really wants to fail health care and that she's scared that that may be the case, yet again the same fearmongering that we saw in the last election.

This bill, Bill 21, is titled Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. There's a reason why we've chosen to put forward an omnibus bill that seeks to address a wide range of areas in order to make sure that we are spending taxpayers' money wisely and in a way that ensures that those programs and services are there for them, something that the members opposite had no clue how to do in their last four years that we had them in this province. Let me remind members of this House and, through you, Mr. Chair, all those listening tonight from their various homes that this province at this point in time is in this fiscal mess that has made it possible for us to come forward with a pragmatic, sensible set of bills to undo all of the damages that members opposite, including the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who sat as the Minister of Health, and the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, who sat as the Minister of Advanced Education – their cabinet pursued policies that devastated our province and our economy.

Let me give this House a very simple example. We collect, on average, in education property taxes $2.4 billion. That's all we can collect, but education K to 9 costs us about $8.4 billion, $8.6 billion. The members opposite will not sit down and ask themselves: if we destroy the critical sector where we make the extra $6 billion, how are we going to fund education for K to 9? You know what their answer is? Their answer is, you know, more taxes and a sales tax. That's all they've got to offer on a real problem. On a real problem that is their answer: a sales tax and more taxes. I ask them, the members opposite: to what extent are you going to tax the people of Alberta before you realize that you are in fact making it impossible for our economy to recoup? To what extent are you going to tax businesses before you realize that sooner or later you will no longer find businesses to tax? Where do we find $6 billion?

If we in this province and in this government chose the line of the members opposite and destroyed our oil and gas sector – you have members of the previous cabinet. You know, I remember the Member for Edmonton-North West, formerly the Member for Edmonton-Calder, with a placard written: no more pipelines. A good number of them right here: the only places where you see them are places where there are protests protesting the same source of the money that they want to spend. If they have their way, if the members opposite should have their way and land-lock Alberta's fossil fuels, the source of the bulk of the money they would want us to spend as if there's no tomorrow, how are we going to pay for those programs and services? How do we pay for them?

The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar sits in this House every single day. All we hear from him is, you know, affirmation of those who seek to destroy our vital economic interests.

Mr. Schmidt: Point of order.

The Deputy Chair: I believe that a point of order has been called. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Point of Order
Imputing Motives

Mr. Schmidt: Yes. Under 23(h) and (i), of course, the Member for Edmonton-South West is making allegations against me, imputing false or unavowed motives to another member, that, of course, being me. I have never ever stood in this House and affirmed anybody in advocating for the economic destruction of this province. I will not stand to listen to the Member for Edmonton-

South West imply or outright say that I do. I ask that he apologize and withdraw.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I'm prepared to rule on this. In this specific case I don't think that there's a point of order. I don't think that it was the hon. minister's intention to quote something. I think that it was more of an idea of debate between views across the floor in this House.

With that, I would ask the hon. minister to continue.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Chair. You are correct. You know, in Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, you will find 16 pieces of legislation that impact on key areas of our government, that pose financial pressures on government resources. We have a responsibility to make sure that the most vulnerable amongst us our taken care of. That is not the subject of debate.

Mr. Schmidt: Then why are you scrapping, what are you moving . . .

Mr. Madu: I can hear the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar heckling, as he always does in this House.

Mr. Schmidt: Point of order, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen on a point of order.

Allegations against a Member

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Of course, under 23(h), makes allegations against another member. I can't remember a single time that I have heckled anybody in this House, and I demand that the Member for Edmonton-South West apologize and withdraw. Maybe, in fact, I can take him on a tour of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and he can apologize to my constituents personally.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I am prepared to rule on this one. I would actually say that in this case I don't find a point of order. What I would say is that I would take this opportunity to remind all members of this House that in the spirit of spirited debate there will obviously be disagreements with regard to what people are saying or how people interpret what is being said.

I am in no way trying to limit individuals in this House from making points of order. However, I would also like to take this opportunity to ensure that hon. members don't use things like points of order to try to join debate. I think that in Committee of the Whole there will be lots of time for us to debate. As you know, individuals aren't limited to 20 minutes only in this forum. They can speak on many different occasions.

If the hon. minister would please continue.

Mr. Madu: Thank you so much, Mr. Chair. I was alluding again to the various legislation that – Bill 21 seeks to make sure that the programs and services under those 16 pieces of legislation are there for those for whom they were made and that they are there for the next generation, our children, our seniors, and those who would use various health care facilities in this province. The point again is that Bill 21 and indeed all of the other bills that we've put forward that will help us implement the budget that we announced in October are all geared towards making sure that we rein in the financial recklessness that we saw in the last four years. We heard in the course of the last campaign that the people of this province told us that the path of the previous NDP government was not sustainable.

Again, a very typical example: we made a commitment to maintain or increase health care spending. Now, that commitment is going to be dependent on our ability to afford it. The members opposite would want us to actually follow through with that commitment. The members on this side are prepared to follow through with that particular commitment, but it will be dependent on our province's ability to pay for it.

You know, in Budget 2019 we followed through with our commitment. In fact, we increased health care spending by over $200 million, but if you listen to the members opposite, you would think that we slashed health care spending by half. Listening to their rhetoric in this Chamber, all you hear is language that causes fear and anxiety in our citizens. They knew quite well that that is far from the truth, that indeed we are spending more money on health care than the budget that they put forward in 2018. Fact. They can't dispute that.

Mr. Chair, you know, Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, seeks to reverse some of the policies that we saw from the previous government. In 2015 the entire provincial government debt was $12 billion. In a short four years they took that particular debt to nearly $64 billion. In 2015, before they assumed office, they inherited a surplus of $1.3 billion. You know what happened? In their very first year they ran a deficit of $6.8 billion; the second year, $10 billion; the third year, $10.1 billion; and in the last year, before the people of this province kicked them out, $6.9 billion.

Now, put that aside. On one side, you see from a surplus of $1.3 billion to a deficit in the billions of dollars in one, two, three, four years. Then look at the debt that they left us: $64 billion, on course to nearly a record $100 billion if the people of this province had not stepped in. Unprecedented in the history of this province. As a consequence – as a consequence – we are spending more than $2 billion on interest. If we didn't do anything, if nothing happened, that $2 billion would become $4 billion. Yet the members opposite sit here every single day and tell us how we should go to a particular point and plug in more money while at the same time seeking to undermine the same source of the money they seek to spend. It doesn't make sense. It doesn't add up. It doesn't add up.

That is why, Mr. Chair, through you to all of our citizens watching from home, Bill 21 is essential – essential – to undo the damages of the previous NDP government so that those programs and services that they care about can be there for them.

You know, they talk about $4.5 billion; then it became $4.7 billion. This is the alternative universe that the NDP lives in. From $4.5 billion it became $4.7 billion. The truth, Mr. Chair, is that more than $60 billion in investment left our province, disappeared. Investors were telling us that as long as we had this previous NDP government, they would not invest. There was so much of a lack of investor confidence everywhere in our province that even investors in foreign countries were telling us that the combination of the federal Liberals and the NDP at the provincial level made it impossible for them to even consider investing in our province.

To them through you, if we do not attract investment in our various communities, into our economy, how do we grow our economy? How do we innovate? How do we create jobs and opportunities? They like to tell us that they are the party that is pro employees. Let me remind them that without businesses, without job creators, you know, you would not have jobs and employment for those who need to get them. Mr. Chair, I spent part of my life litigating on labour and employment law and actually on behalf of employees, and I had the opportunity, as someone who has spent hundreds of hours with the same people they claim to protect, to try to figure out what is important to them. There's nothing more important to them than to make sure that they have that job to be able to take care of themselves and their families, pay their bills, save for retirement, and take their families on vacations. Those are some of the things that are important to them.

What did we get in four years? Record job losses, unprecedented: 200,000. Two hundred thousand job losses and they tell us that their policies were working. Meanwhile our economy was bleeding jobs. They tell us that their policies were working; in the meantime our province and our economy was bleeding investment to friendly jurisdictions in North America.

Mr. Chair, recently we heard that south of the border, Texas in particular, has had more than $200 billion in investment from the chemical sector. We have oil and gas in abundance, all of the natural resources that that particular sector would require. We have that in abundance here, and throughout the four years that the NDP were in office, they refused to come here. There's a reason for that. When political leaders speak, it's not just citizens who listen. The business community pays attention. That is why, you know, when I sit here and hear them use language like pickpockets to describe employers, to describe the people who create the jobs that our employees need, when I hear the members opposite say that we are giving away $4.7 billion to wealthy corporations, it tells me right away that they have not a shred of understanding on how you build an economy.

The truth is that when you have a depressed economy, when companies are telling you that they cannot expand, when they have been taxed to death – again, remember, Mr. Chair, that the previous government told us that if we increased the corporate tax by 20 per cent, we would get more revenue and we'd be able to fund more programs and services and wouldn't have to borrow. What happened? The 20 per cent led to a $6 billion hole in the provincial treasury. As a consequence, they embarked on this reckless borrowing. How do we, then, incentivize our business community to make sure that those businesses are here, expanding and investing? I would submit that Bill 21 and indeed, you know, the $4.5 billion that they allege and they like to say is a tax cut to wealthy corporations are part of our plan to restore investor confidence and make sure that we are creating the jobs of tomorrow.

It will take time. It took four years for them to send away more than 200,000 jobs from our economy. It took four years for them to rack up $60 billion in debt. It took four years for them to give us four straight deficits, billions of dollars in deficits. We will not undo all of their damage in eight months. I am thankful that this side of the House recognizes that, and we are embarking on that hard work to undo all of those damages for the sake of this economy, for the sake of the same employees you seek to protect and advocate for so that we can once again rebuild our economy and be able to afford the programs and services that our people rely on.

With that, Mr. Chair, obviously, I will be supporting Bill 21. I urge all of the members of this House to support this bill so that we can begin to undo the damages that the previous NDP government caused to our economy.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen to speak.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm proud to rise after that particular speech. We have the Member for Edmonton-South West going on at great length about the deficit, which, incidentally, is $2 billion higher this year under the UCP than it was under the NDP last year. I think it's also worth noting that the Member for Edmonton-South West went on at length about the raising of taxes, which I consider very interesting in light of the fact that he is basically chief minister in charge of the raising of taxes. This bill alone, in fact, significantly cuts funding to municipalities, specifically police funding to municipalities, forcing them to raise taxes or cut police. I think that municipalities are quite rational individuals, and they know that this is not a good time to be cutting back on police, so that foists the costs onto the residents of those municipalities.

In addition, Mr. Chair, this minister has significantly cut MSI flowing to municipalities, again raising taxes on those municipal residents. The proposal in this bill, which was circulated to municipalities, rural municipalities specifically to make them pay up to 70 per cent of their police costs, could cost each individual resident up to $400 a year on their property taxes. So I think it's a bit rich for the Member for Edmonton-South West to rise in this place and talk about how his values are not to raise taxes when, in fact, he has raised taxes on every Albertan in this province. The fact that he has used a shell game to force it onto municipalities doesn't change that fact. This is a bill that raises taxes. And that's fine. It's within the government's purview to do that, but at the end of the day it's, I think, an unfair allegation to suggest that he's against raising taxes when, in fact, he has done so on various fronts at various times.

Now, certainly, there are a number of other issues in this bill, which I will be happy to address. I think that what I had hoped to address in this particular instance was changes to education, to advanced education specifically, but I see that we have reached 6 o'clock, so I will save my comments for our return.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Noting the time being 6 o'clock, the committee stands recessed until 7:30 p.m., at which time we will continue with Bill 21 in Committee of the Whole.

[The committee adjourned at 6 p.m.]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

Bill 21 Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's always a pleasure to get up and speak about the vitamin C showers and the champagne bars and luxury hotels.

An Hon. Member: It was champagne baths.

Member Loyola: Well, you know, I mean, technically, if you wanted to, you could take the champagne, put it in the bathtub, and you can have yourself a champagne bath, now, couldn't you? Who knows what it is that the Premier's staff is doing while he's there in London. We don't know, right? We don't know.

The Chair: Hon. member, as much as I enjoy vitamin C showers, I suspect we're going to get to the bill quite quickly.

Member Loyola: Yes. Most definitely. See, I love to talk about the exorbitant expenditures that this Premier and the Premier's staff indulge in while specifically asking Albertans to sacrifice so that we can, how they put it in this bill, ensure fiscal sustainability for the province of Alberta.

Now, it's surprising. So many times you have members on the other side speak about these kinds of exorbitant luxury costs and say: "Oh, no, no, no. That's not the case. We need to be fiscally responsible. We need to watch our spending." Yet here we have the Premier hopping on a jet with his friends, no less, from a pancake breakfast over to another municipality on a private jet. On a private jet. Now, it would be one thing if maybe they flew economy class. You know, I like to fly economy class. It's a little tight.

I remember that there was this one time where I got bumped up to business, and wow. That was luxurious. So I can't even imagine what it was like for the Premier to get on his private jet with his friends and just have a good old time as they were flying from this pancake breakfast. It must have been luxurious. It must have been really luxurious. At the same time, this Premier and this cabinet are asking all of us to approve a bill that's going to make the most vulnerable people here in the province of Alberta pay and make sacrifices. See, this is what we constantly get – this is what we constantly get – with Conservative governments, putting in place these kinds of budgets.

You know, austerity budgets let the people pay, yet those who are living high on the hog – there are those who even in this province say: "You know what? I don't mind. Let's have a progressive tax. I don't mind paying a little bit more because I happen to make a little bit more." These same Albertans that have a conscience say: "Hey, I don't mind paying just a little bit more so that I can help out my brother Albertan, my sister Albertan, my friend Albertan." I want to make sure that I'm gender inclusive – right? – Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. This is what I find just incredibly problematic with these austerity budgets, that not everybody has to make the sacrifices. Why?

Now, I get it. I get it. You know, like, our friends on the conservative side that like to implement these austerity budgets: they often point to bad apples, bad people, and say: "Oh, look at them. They're taking advantage of the system." We hear an awful lot of rhetoric, maybe not from the members inside this House but from conservatives that speak ill even of people who are on AISH. I'm sure that some of the people in this House have heard the judgments that are made about people who live on AISH: "They're living off the system. Why don't they just get a job?"

Mr. Jason Nixon: Oh, shame on you.

Member Loyola: No. That's what I hear from conservatives that actually come to my office. That's what I hear from people who propose to support the UCP: why can't these people just get a job? Well, it happens to be that they're severely handicapped. That's why they can't work. Now, I'm not saying that the members of this House are saying that. I'm not saying that. I'm saying that this is a common judgment out there that we need to put an end to.

Now, someone who's living on AISH has to make the decision at the beginning of the month how much they are going to allocate. When you talk about budget, you can best be assured that for people who are living on AISH, they know what it's like to live on a budget. They know what it's like to have to make sure that each and every penny is accounted for, because they know, when it comes to the end of the month, it's going to mean paying the telephone bill or buying groceries or, you know, buying those extra dozen eggs at the end of the month. It's like that, things that perhaps we don't really have to be that concerned about here in this House, as members of this House. Perhaps we're not pinching pennies as much as the people who are on AISH are.

But this is a serious concern, and this is why I continually bring it up in this House, that all the members of this House should be really considering when it comes to this austerity budget that you want to put forward: who are you asking to make the sacrifices? People on AISH. We're also asking our fine seniors to make cuts. We learned today that more cuts are coming for seniors when it comes to – what was it again? Help me out here. It was the insurance. They need to take the exam to be insured so that they can get their driver's licence. That's once every two years after 75, and then after 80 it's once every year. This government is going to cut funding specifically so that those seniors – and this is something that the Alberta government requires of them. Now, I'm not saying that we shouldn't. Yes, we need to make sure that our seniors that are driving are driving safe, but give them a hand. You're asking them to do this. You're asking them to comply with this. Help them out. Why are you taking funding away from this important necessity for seniors that want to be able to drive around the city?

You know, my mom – she'd probably kill me if I referred to her as a senior, but she is – is 75. But you know what? She's 75, and she acts like a 45-year-old. She's always keeping herself busy. You know, I have not seen another person that has dedicated so much of their time and effort to renovation projects of her apartment condo like my mom. She just loves keeping busy, but she's a senior and she's on a fixed income. Instead of this government making life better for seniors all around, they're taking money out of their pockets.

We've got this austerity budget. We're asking the most vulnerable in our society to make the sacrifices for this austerity budget. At the same time, we have a Premier that has decided to give away $4.7 billion as a way to be able to draw investment to this province, but we have yet to see one new job from this failed economic policy. I say “failed” because it’s been tried in so many other jurisdictions across North America. We don’t see it working. Then we’ve got to ask the members from the other side: “If you see that it doesn’t work in other jurisdictions, why is it that you are so adamant in applying it here in the province of Alberta? Why are you so adamant about doing it?”

You’ve got an austerity budget that’s asking the seniors and those on AISH, the most vulnerable, to sacrifice in order to meet the demands of this austerity budget so that we can pay off the debt, and we’re giving away $4.7 billion to corporations that are actually taking the money and running. They’re going and investing it in other jurisdictions across North America. But the Premier sees fit to jump on a private jet with his friends and go have a good old time, right? Not only that, but we see an employee directly related to the Premier’s office going to London a number of times and staying in a luxury hotel. It was, like, $16,000 a trip, I believe.

It’s important, then, that we ask ourselves, because you can’t be asking the most vulnerable in society to make the sacrifices if you yourself aren’t willing to lead by example. Lead by example. If you’re going to continue to live in the lap of luxury while implementing an austerity budget but then ask the most vulnerable people in our society to pay for it, what does that say? What does that say? I’m asking the members on the other side to please, please, please consider what it is that you are doing by voting in favour of Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. You know what? Members, my friends from the UCP, I agree that we need to be sustainable. We need to be responsible. But don’t ask the most vulnerable in our society to pay for it. Don’t ask the most vulnerable in our society to pay for it. This is the reality that we need to be asking ourselves right now.

Now, there were cuts to lodge funding, the deindexing of benefits. But you know what? I don’t want to get too judgmental. Okay. I’m going to put it this way. The one that I feel is probably the most heartbreaking is kicking dependants off the seniors’ drug plan. That is heartbreaking. Seniors, who have dedicated their lives to making Alberta a great place: you’re going to kick them off this drug plan because you’re trying to meet the demands of paying off this debt. I’d say: “Hey, reverse that one. Reverse that. Reverse the deindexing of benefits. Reverse kicking dependants off the seniors’ drug plan.” I’m sure that many of you have mothers and fathers, seniors in your life, and you know how dependent they have become on new drugs as they’re growing older and older. We all know that seniors are living longer and longer, and they require medication. That’s why I say that this one is the most heartbreaking.

I see some of the members on the other side shaking their heads. It’s heartbreaking that you’re asking seniors to make this particular sacrifice. I’m just asking the members on the other side to please consider what it is that they’re proposing by bringing in Bill 21, this so-called Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act.

One of the other things that I find particularly troubling as well is keeping fine money from municipalities and the fact that, from a government who said that they were going to increase funding for policing, here we are debating a way to open the back door to the cuts. Municipalities all across the province are going to have to figure out how to deal with the cuts that this government is now putting in place, much the same as is happening with education.

I know that there are a lot of members from the other side, representing the UCP here in this House, that represent rural communities. I’m interested in knowing what the constituents of these rural communities are saying to you when it comes to Bill 21. I’d love to hear from members on the other side about what their constituents are saying regarding this, right? It’s interesting that so many from rural communities voted for the UCP, and now those same people that voted for the UCP are going to have to pay for it because money is being kept from municipalities. Municipalities have no other choice than to increase property tax on those same people, so they’re going to have to pay for the same services that they had in the past.

See, this is the thing. Yes, we do want to ensure fiscal sustainability, but who are the people that we’re asking to sacrifice?. That is the question. Why can’t we figure out a way where the most vulnerable Albertans are not the ones that are going to have to make the sacrifices that you’re asking them to make here in Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act. Now, I’ve talked before about postsecondary students and how much they’re going to have to pay. Student loans are going to end up costing them more in interest. People are going to have to pay higher electricity bills. I’ve already talked about the hardship for seniors, those on AISH.

The one that I can’t really understand is the attack on doctors, why this is something that you’d roll into this omnibus piece of legislation. I get it. You’re trying to negotiate. But this whole thing on doctor practitioner IDs: I mean, it’s been tried in other jurisdictions.

The Chair: Hon. members, I see the hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Good to see you this evening, and thank you for an opportunity to respond on behalf of the government caucus in regard to that bizarre speech that we just heard. I have to say that I have some concerns. It may come as a surprise to you that I disagree with, well, everything that that hon. member just said.

The problem that we see with the NDP – and I spoke about this in question period yesterday – is that the NDP continue to misrepresent facts to Albertans, continue to mislead the province about what is actually taking place with the hon. Finance minister’s budget. They continue to say things that are just not factual, Madam Chair. A great example of it in this session, of course, was during question period, when the Official Opposition said to the minister of culture that she had spent $35,000 on booze, that her office had spent $35,000 on alcohol. At the time I got up, you may recall, and I said that they had jumped the shark. I knew for sure that the minister of culture had not spent $35,000 on liquor inside her ministerial office. I’d known her a long time. It didn’t make any sense at all. I already knew that that, in fact, was not factual. It turns out that it wasn’t factual. It turns out that it was for a museum, that has a restaurant. And it turns out that the supplier, despite implications from the NDP to the opposite, was actually somebody that was used when the NDP were in government.

There are lots of examples like that, and there are lots of examples of that right in the hon. member’s speech. For example, health care funding is being cut. The hon. member spent a considerable amount of time – I don’t know if my colleagues noticed this – saying that health care spending is going to be cut in our province. Now, Madam Chair, as pointed out by the Premier – and the hon. member knows this because I know that he’s looked at the budget – health care spending, in fact, is at the highest that it has ever been in the history of our province. It has not been cut. In fact, it has been increased, as the hon. Health minister can articulate and already has.

Now, education has been cut: that’s the other one that the hon. member says. Well, that’s a misrepresentation of facts. Right there in black and white in the budget it shows that education spending remains exactly the same.

Further to that, Madam Chair – you might find this interesting. There are two things, again, of misrepresenting facts repeatedly inside this Chamber, but then they said that children's services have been cut. In fact, the Children's Services budget has been increased – has been increased – not cut. The Community and Social Services budget cut according to the hon. member: not accurate. In fact, that budget has been increased. Seniors and Housing has also been increased.

The reality is that Albertans figured this out back on April 5, when they fired the NDP from government. They knew you could not trust what they said. Madam Chair, at the end of the day, the NDP just make it up. That's what they do. You see them do it each day in question period. You see the hon. member doing it here tonight. Yet again the NDP are presenting things over and over that are not factual.

Now, I want to talk a little bit about this private jet allegation from the hon. member. What it specifically has to do with Bill 21 I don't know, Madam Chair. But the reality is that the hon. member spent a significant amount of time speaking about it in regard to that legislation, so I guess he certainly feels that it has something to do with this piece of legislation. So let's talk about that a little bit. As the Premier said, he had a group of Premiers from all across the country and they had to use a plane to be able to get them to a meeting. If I recall – I'm looking at my colleague the hon. Minister of Finance – it was a $16,000 flight.

Mr. Toews: Yes.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I could be off slightly on that. I got confirmation: it was $16,000. He flew them there, and they had a meeting. To build coalitions across this country is a priority, I would say, and he did that. He met with the Premiers.

Now, fast-forward a couple of months later, and just yesterday the Premier returned from Toronto. What did he do when he was in Toronto, Madam Chair? He came back from Toronto with the support of every Premier in this country to stand up for the province of Alberta. Every Premier, including Quebec and Ontario, B.C., and the territories to the north. Obviously, of course, not surprising that Saskatchewan and Manitoba would be in that group as well as the Maritimes. He came back with the support of all of them to stand up for this province and this country against Justin Trudeau and Bill C-69. That's what he did. That's what happens when you build bridges like our Premier has.

Now, the other contrast is what the now Leader of the Official Opposition did when she was Premier when it came to Bill C-69. I think it's a great example because it's a direct comparison with what the Premier just did in Ontario. We go back now to what the former Premier did. The current leader of the NDP, still leader even when she was Premier but now Leader of the Opposition, sat in this Chamber for 200 and some days while members of the opposition, including myself, sat in the benches they're in now and asked them questions each and every day about why they wouldn't get on an airplane and fly down to Ontario and stand up for this province to Justin Trudeau in advance of Bill C-69.

You want to criticize the now Premier of Alberta for spending $16,000 to help build a coalition of Premiers across this country to stand up for this province? Madam Chair, that's ridiculous. Through you to that hon. member, that is a ridiculous argument. I am proud that our Premier has taken the time to build those relationships with Premiers across the country, and now you're seeing the results in regard to the equalization rebate agreement from Premiers, that that is something we should look at. That alone could result in well over a billion dollars. The hon. Finance minister is going to give me that number in a moment, too.

Mr. Toews: One point seven.

Mr. Jason Nixon: One point seven billion dollars. Well, I can tell you that if it cost you $16,000 to get all the Premiers together to be able to result in well over a billion dollars returning to this province, my constituents will say: good job, Mr. Premier. I say, through you, Madam Chair, to him: good job, Mr. Premier.

Going and defending our province is not something to be ashamed of. Building bridges across this Confederation to be able to defend the interests of Alberta is not something to be ashamed of, and I certainly know that the Premier is not ashamed of it. I can certainly tell you that this government is not ashamed of it, and not one member of the government caucus is ashamed of it. We're proud of our Premier for doing that. We're proud of our Premier for standing up for our province. It's about time somebody did, Madam Chair.

Now, the hon. member likes to talk about rural Alberta. He makes no secret that he's not from rural Alberta – he represents an urban constituency – and I make no secret that I'm from rural Alberta though I love urban Alberta. I love rural Alberta. I love Alberta, but I'm proud to be from rural Alberta. I'm proud to be a rural Albertan. I'm proud to have raised my family in rural Alberta. I see that my little brother is laughing. I was born in urban Alberta, with him, but I saw the light, in my mind, and I moved to rural Alberta.

Mr. Toews: What part of Alberta?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Rural Alberta. I'm proud to be from rural Alberta, and I am proud to call rural Alberta home, and I am very proud of my constituents who are from rural Alberta, as I am of urban Alberta.

I don't see this as rural versus urban Alberta. We need urban Alberta and we need rural Alberta to succeed. It's about Alberta, but I am not ashamed to be from rural Alberta, and, yes, rural Alberta, like urban Alberta, has different needs on certain things. Our lifestyles are different, and we have different things that we need, and that hon. member seems to want to rise in the House and be able to say that he can articulate the concerns of rural Alberta and then ask: who's standing up for rural Alberta? Well, Madam Chair, that hon. member sat on this side of the House in a government who had every opportunity to be able to stand up and learn about rural Alberta, every opportunity to represent rural Alberta. In fact, they had members from all across rural Alberta, particularly in the north, and they had their chances.

Now look across the aisle. Look across the aisle. Not one member from rural Alberta. Rural Alberta spoke loud and clear on April 5 on who they want to represent them, and it ain't the NDP. So you should maybe think a little bit about that. Through you, Madam Chair, to the hon. member: think a little bit about your approach, because I can tell you that what the NDP is selling, rural Alberta ain't buying, and they ain't going to buy it any time soon. They have outright rejected the NDP because of their behaviour.

Now, this other thing, about trying to imply – and the hon. member went out of his way to make it clear that he was not referring to a member of the Legislature, which is good, because that would be unparliamentary – that supporters of the United Conservative Party were coming to his office to tell him that people on AISH should just get a job. Now, if somebody came to the hon. member's office and said that, shame on them. That is completely inappropriate and not something that this party would stand for at all, nor should anybody stand for it. But let's think about that in the context of the fact that the NDP, as a general rule, are just making things up. We've seen it over and over. And now that hon. member somehow wants this House to believe that a random United Conservative Party member came to his office to visit with him just to tell him that people on AISH should get a job. If somebody did that, shame on them. But that's not how the Conservative side of the House thinks. That's not how this government thinks.

I was proud, when I was in opposition, to vote for the very first raise for AISH in a very, very long time. This government, under the leadership of the minister and the Finance minister, have kept that raise. They've kept that raise. The idea that somehow AISH is being reduced is not factual. That's another thing that is not factual. Yes, the indexing is not in place. The indexing was never in place under the NDP, not for one year. That's a fact. But at no time has anybody in this House tried to take away that increase for the people that are on AISH. At no time has anybody shown anything but compassion for people that are in those situations.

Madam Chair, my little brother, the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein, and I had the privilege of working for many years with people that needed AISH. I understand why AISH is needed inside this province. I've seen people struggle to even get on AISH sometimes and to be able then to make ends meet. We understand that. We're deeply compassionate. That's an important part of our lives, and for that hon. member to in any way imply that anybody who has conservative thought somehow doesn't care about somebody who may need AISH is shameful and, quite frankly, just an absolutely ridiculous statement by that hon. member, and he knows it. He knows it.

You know what Albertans need? You want to talk about compassion? Albertans need us to get the economy going. They need to get people back to work. They need to get taxes flowing back inside this province. They need to be able to have the money to be able to get the services that people need, including people that find themselves in a spot where they have to be on AISH. That is exactly what the hon. Finance minister and this government are trying to do. That's what Albertans voted for, to get us back on track.

Madam Chair, why did we have to do it? Why did we have to find 2.8 cents in savings? That, in the grand scheme of things, is not as drastic as the NDP are trying to make it sound; that's for sure. I can tell you that in my constituency – do you want to know what rural Alberta thinks? Rural Alberta doesn't think it's that drastic. In fact, I would think many of my constituents think it's maybe a little low, but we are trying to find balance to be able to make sure we protect services.

What they really need – you want compassion? – is not what the NDP did. What the NDP did was oversee over a hundred thousand people losing their jobs. They sat on their hands while people inside my constituency lost their homes and hadn't worked for years. That hon. member talked about rural crime. They sat on this side of the House and laughed. Their leader laughed at us when we asked questions about what was taking place with rural crime inside our constituencies. Finally, now we've got a Justice minister that actually came to Rocky Mountain House. I know that became a funny thing in question period because the Justice minister kept inviting them to my home in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, but really in some ways it wasn't funny because I invited them for years to come out there and see what was happening to my constituents. That's not compassion, what they have done there.

Putting a carbon tax on fixed-income seniors and having them struggle to pay their bills: that's not compassion, Madam Chair. That's not compassion. What the NDP are trying to pass themselves off as is absolutely ridiculous. That is the party that just seven months ago oversaw the demise of this province, put us into the largest debts in our history, the largest deficits in our history, oversaw the largest job loss in the history of this province, caused tens of billions of dollars of investment to flee this province under their watch. And they have the nerve to stand up here and act like they're compassionate? They're not compassionate. Tell that to all the job creators across this province who've lost their businesses, who risked everything while this side of the House, the former government, now the NDP, sat on their hands and didn't even bother to help them and, in fact, often criticized them, that it was somehow a bad thing to be a job creator and create businesses and put people to work inside this province. Well, shame on them for that. They want to say shame on us and that we're not compassionate and then mislead Albertans as a party in regard to what is actually taking place with the budget.

Let's talk about farmers and ranchers. The hon. member is now the great champion of rural Alberta. Well, I could tell you that the farm and ranch community certainly didn't support the NDP. Why? Why did they not support the NDP? Interestingly enough, Madam Chair, they did support them in northern Alberta in 2015, but they did not support them in northern Alberta in 2019. Why? Because that party sold out farm and ranch communities. They sat in the same benches that are right here. The former Finance minister, sitting right where the current Finance minister of Alberta was sitting, said to me – and you can go see it on Facebook – that farmers and ranchers inside my communities were deliberately trying to hurt their employees. He said that, said that they were trying to force them to put hands in machines so that they could lose their hands and all this stuff. Look, I put it up on Facebook because I couldn't believe it at the time. That's not compassion. That's not respect for the people that built this province.

It's absolutely ridiculous that the NDP keep doing this. The reason why it frustrates me so much isn't because we sit here and listen to this. In fact, Madam Chair, most of the time when I hear the NDP misleading with misrepresenting facts inside this process, I just shake my head and move on. But the reality is that this time around they're scaring people for no reason. Telling people that health care is cut when it's not cut and it's increased is scaring people for no reason. Telling people that Education has been cut when it has not been cut is scaring people for no reason. Telling people on AISH that their benefits are going to go down when they're not going to go down is scaring people for no reason over and over and over, and there's no need for that.

The Official Opposition has a responsibility in this Chamber, and they should do it, Madam Chair. They should do their role. In fact, earlier today I helped them do that by taking a bill and putting it back into committee because they wanted more opportunity to debate that bill and do amendments on that bill. That's their job. So I stood up for them in this Chamber as Government House Leader and brought it back to committee to help them. But what their job is not to do is to not go out of their way to scare everyday Albertans, who are working hard and living their lives across this province, who don't have time, obviously, to go through the entire hon. Finance minister's budget in detail, like we do in this Chamber. They elected us to do that. They depend on their elected representatives to tell them what is taking place inside this Chamber or with the budget, and then their elected representatives stand up in this House and over and over and over say that there are cuts that are taking place that are not taking place.

Madam Chair, that hon. member knows that Health spending has increased. He knows that. I've known him a while. He's definitely capable of reading the budget, and I've seen him talk about the budget in detail in standing committees and when I've served on standing committees with that hon. member before. He knows that. He also knows that the Education budget hasn't been reduced. He knows that, but he chooses to spend his time in this Chamber trying to create fear. At the end of the day, that's what the NDP Party, sadly – sadly – have become.

It is shocking to me that the NDP still have not taken the time to find out why they sit on that side of the House. I could tell you. I was there when the Progressive Conservative Party was ousted in 2015, and all of us sat on that side of the House. I could tell you that the very first thing that we did, Madam Chair – I know you were there – was that we took time and we sat down and said: what the heck went wrong? We started to adjust to that, started to recognize the mistakes of our party and the mistakes of some of those who came before us. We began to adjust it. That's how we ended up back on this side of the Chamber. Albertans gave us the privilege of representing them as their government again in here because we took the time to do that. The NDP, clearly, have not done that if you just listened to that speech.

At the end of the day, you know why that is, Madam Chair? Because they're angry with Albertans. They're mad at Albertans because Albertans fired them. They're mad at Albertans because Albertans rejected their carbon tax. They're mad at Albertans because Albertans rejected their terrible fiscal mismanagement. You know what they're most mad at Albertans about? Because Albertans saw through their fear and smear and were not going to accept being misled by the NDP Party anymore.

Madam Chair, through you to Albertans, I want to assure them that this government will not do the behaviour of the Official Opposition. We will continue to fulfill the promises that we made to them inside this Chamber, we will continue to stand up for them each and every day, we will continue to bring this province forward in the most compassionate way that we can while trying to make sure that our province succeeds, and, yes, up to and including sitting here each and every night and listening to the bizarre behaviour of the NDP as they continue to try to scare Albertans. I will still continue to repeatedly stand up and say, Madam Chair, through you to them: "Shame on you. Shame on you for your behaviour, shame on you for your behaviour when you were in government, and shame on you for your behaviour now. Stop doing it. Stand up and do your job for real. Stop scaring Albertans."

The Chair: Are there other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. And now for something completely different and factual. There are a couple of things in this bill that I'd like to speak to. I know I have had the opportunity to speak to a couple of different sections of this bill, but two of the things that I feel like I haven't touched on too much and that I really want to talk about are changes with respect to Advanced Education and changes with respect to Health, in part because they influence one of the things that ultimately, I think, drove me into politics. That is the view that when we're budgeting, ultimately what we're having is a collective discussion about our values. It is a way that signals our values. I've heard it said: "Don't tell me what your values are. Show me your budget, and I'll tell you what your values are." I think that it is true, because it's very easy to pay lip service to something, but to actually make that investment is more challenging.

One of the reasons, I think, that that is so incredibly important is that it is absolutely possible to save money in the short term that costs you far, far more in the long term. It's possible to affect your bottom line in a positive way in one year but actually cost yourself

10 times more in future years. I think, for instance, of my house. Say that I were to choose not to replace my roof when it needed replacement. Potentially, that could wind up with mould going all through my house, and that would be much more expensive. So even though I appeared to be a competent fiscal manager and saved myself the cost of the roof in one year, ultimately the cleanup of the rest of the house and the restoration, potentially, of the rest of the house would cost orders of magnitude more. Some of these cuts, I think, do exactly that.

I'm going to start with Advanced Education. I think that, at the end of the day, Madam Chair, Advanced Education is one of the ways in which we most successfully prepare our people for the future, through which we diversify the economy. I think that, at the end of the day, this is an incredibly important area to invest in. I also believe that people should have the right to access education based on how hard they're willing to work, not based on how much money their parents have, not based on the family that they were born into, not based on the location in which they were born but based on how hard they're willing to work and what they can achieve. I think that should be a fundamental value that we all share.

This bill, in my view, attacks that because what it does is that it allows tuition to increase at massive rates. What that means is that when people are being selected for university, instead of being selected on the basis of their past performance, instead of being selected on the basis of their marks or their volunteer work or various other contributions that they themselves have made, they are selected based on how much money they have access to. You know, when you're 17 and you're applying for university, the money that you have access to is based, in large part, on your parents' financial situation. What I don't like about these changes, the suspending of the tuition cap, is that it changes things so that those who are getting into university are those who have greater financial means as opposed to those who have worked harder. That fundamentally conflicts with my values, and I think that it conflicts with the values of a lot of Albertans.

Seeing tuition costs skyrocket at the same time that we're talking about increasing interest on student loans: I think that's a challenge. I think that's a challenge for a lot of people. I'm sad that this is the direction of our advanced education system, because education is the great leveller. It's what allows everyone the ability to make the best of themselves in society. Education is fundamentally something that I think everyone deserves to have the right to access. I think that education should be accessible, again, based on what you've done, on your performance, on your marks, on your volunteer work, not on your parents' financial situation, over which you had no control. You were simply born into that situation. So that is one part of the bill that I think is very bad. Obviously, I think all parts of this bill are bad, but in particular I wanted to highlight that one.

Again, I think that this reduction in Advanced Education – why I don't like it from a fiscal standpoint? Because it costs us more in the long run. We save a little bit of money now; meanwhile people don't have that access to education. People don't have the opportunity to get out there and get the education they need to have businesses and diversify the economy and contribute in the ways in which we can. When we're selecting the individuals who are ultimately going to hold those positions on the basis, again, of their parents' financial means rather than the basis of their own achievement, I don't think we're necessarily creating the best economy for the future, and I think that costs us all, each and every one of us.

The other part I wanted to talk about in this bill that I think also potentially has that impact of saving money in the short term and ultimately costing more in the long term: one of the things this bill does is that – it doesn't do it, but it allows the government the ability to unilaterally terminate the doctor compensation agreement. Now, obviously, the compensation agreement for physicians that we were handed in government was not something we were delighted with. It was handed to us by the previous Conservative government. It grew in costs at 8 per cent a year, every year for 10 years, which is not, in my view, prudent.

So we went back, and we sat down with the doctors. I'm so proud of my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glenora and the work that she did. She saved this province half a billion dollars in doctors' costs. I think that's exceptional. She did it without creating strife and without violating agreements. She went to the table and she asked people to come to the table and said: look, this is the situation we're in. They voluntarily came to the table and helped out. This was actually the case with many people throughout the province who voluntarily came to the table and committed to take less or to take zeroes. I think we should thank those people for being willing to be committed to the province and not punish them or call them out or call them lazy.

This gives the government the ability to alter those contracts unilaterally. Why this concerns me: I'll just take one example. One of the things that's being floated out there right now is to remove an additional cost that goes to family physicians when dealing with complex care. Why does that upset me? Because what it means is that physicians essentially, if they're dealing with a more complex client, are not getting compensated for that time, so they're having to volunteer their time. Well, as anyone who's ever run a business knows, there are certain things that you'll do out of the goodness of your heart to give back to those in the community around you because that's an important part of running a business. But it's also the case that you can't work for free because you have costs to cover. You have an office to cover. You have staff to pay. You can't volunteer a hundred per cent of your time because it's not going to work in the long run.

What this does is that because it makes those doctors have to treat those more complex patients for free, it means that some doctors just aren't going to take any on at all because they're not interested in volunteering their time, and other doctors are likely to find themselves in the position where they can't volunteer a hundred per cent of their time. They have staff to worry about to pay, they have office costs to pay, so they're not going to be able to absorb all of those complex clients. This is bad for doctors because they're having to turn patients away. It's bad for patients because they're not getting their needs met. Ultimately, it's bad for the system, and it's bad for the bottom line. Those complex patients don't vanish into thin air just because the government refuses to acknowledge them. They go to acute care. They walk into the emergency room, where it costs us multiple times that amount to treat them, where it costs us far, far more than it would have cost us simply to give them access to a family physician, where potentially they wait until they get much sicker, and then they have to be hospitalized.

I liken this to a situation that I've always found interesting, where someone presents with something like bronchitis. We're not willing to pay for their antibiotics because we don't have universal drug coverage. We don't pay for their antibiotics, so they get worse, and eventually they get pneumonia, and then we pay orders of magnitude more to hospitalize them. Well, that doesn't make a lot of sense, really. I think that this is a very similar situation, and it upsets me because it's trying to play a shell game. It's trying to save money this year by spending more money somewhere else. I think that's bad for all of us. It's bad for political discourse because it doesn't appropriately communicate what we're talking about. Most of all, it's bad for these patients.

So those are two pieces of the legislation that I feel that I wanted to highlight and get a chance to talk about why they're frustrating to me. I think with that, I will finish. I'm sure I will get a chance to address this issue again. I think that there are a lot of pieces that are of concern in this particular bill.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Hon. members, indulge me for a minute. I have a friend visiting from Airdrie who has joined us in the gallery, Pastor Biyi from Airdrie, my friend Biyi. Anyway, I know we're not in introductions, but I'm the chair, so I can do that.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-West.

Ms Phillips: All right. Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm rising this evening to speak in committee to Bill 21, entitled Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Of course, one of the questions that I have asked many times rising in bill debate around this extensive piece of legislation – it's quite a long bill with a number of different bills amended within it – is: fiscal sustainability for whom? Certainly, the deficit this year is $2 billion higher than the deficit last year. Certainly, we are at the end of the forecast period under consideration in these budget papers, expecting $93 billion in debt in this province, so that is virtually the same as was forecast at the Q3 economic update earlier in 2019.

Certainly, this bill itself contemplates a number of changes to the bottom line for ordinary people given as it is paired with, obviously, the legislation that we passed earlier this year around reducing the corporate income tax rate for already profitable corporations, paired with, of course, the increase in personal income tax of some $600 million by the end of 2022, sort of mildly ridiculously referred to as a savings for government when, in fact, it is an increased cost for ordinary people, some $200 to $300 in the first instance for a typical family, for an average family. That, of course, will continue to rise, given that the government has not articulated any form of end in sight to that particular tax hike for people.

This Bill 21 also contains within it some of the more cruel and unusual pieces of public policy. Not a year ago members of this government caucus voted for indexation of benefits. It took them less than a year to turn their backs on recipients of assured income for the severely handicapped by reversing that indexation, having the temerity to refer to that as not onerous at $30 a month in the first instance. Of course, it will escalate through the power of compound interest, Madam Chair, over the years. Again, this government has made absolutely no commitment to any end in sight for AISH recipients or people who receive Alberta Works or people who are beneficiaries of the seniors' lodge program. That indeed is an element that many Albertans find distasteful, that there has been no straight talk with people who receive those benefits or many other benefits such as the seniors' lodge program and the monthly allowance for people in long-term care. If I know anything about seniors, and I do – I represent a very large number of seniors in Lethbridge – they notice and they vote, Madam Chair. So that is a thing that is real for the government's consideration in Bill 21.

There are a number of other measures contemplated in Bill 21 that I want to speak to this evening that I haven't yet. First of all, there were some measures around health care that are both interesting and I think are designed to introduce chaos into our publicly administered health care system and certainly undermine the consensus that Albertans have that a single-payer health care system is indeed the way that we want to take care of ourselves and one another. In particular, we have – it seems, anyway, coming from this government – a great deal of appetite to pick a big fight with doctors. Allowing changes to the master agreement with the Alberta Medical Association has enabled in this bill, in the first instance, essentially setting up a situation where the members of the AMA are expected to bargain in good faith, but the government is not. That makes for not only an uneven playing field but a great deal of frustration among physicians and instability in the system. Instability in the patient-doctor relationship ends up being patients who suffer, ultimately. Physicians are only too aware of this, which is why they have spoken out against the provisions in this bill.

I certainly have heard from physicians in Lethbridge who are not amused, Madam Chair, not in the slightest, with this very unilateral, heavy-handed move by this government contained hidden within a bill that also does a number of other things and sort of shoved through in a massive omnibus exercise, reminiscent of the way Stephen Harper governed. Well, we know what happened after people grew tired of that type of governing. They showed them the door.

You know, I do believe, though, that there are a number of legitimate conversations that we ought to be having around the future of our health care system. There is no question that a system as complex as our medicare system, which is, of course, the envy of the world, requires constant improvement. Even the master agreement with the AMA: as it comes to an end and expires, it ought to be renewed. Of course, there can be improvement on that agreement as we go along but not in a situation where we are actively sowing the seeds of bad faith. That, in particular, if the government is looking for amendments, would be a good-faith one and to simply not move forward with that and just move forward with good-faith bargaining. We were able to do it and achieve significant savings on this side of the House when it was our turn to do it. They can do it, too, Madam Chair.

But if that's still on the table, then might I suggest some other priorities for Lethbridge health care, in particular, and in southern Alberta. I think, in the first instance, the government ought to commit to keeping the Pincher Creek, Cardston, and Raymond hospitals open. There is a great deal of concern as they close acute-care beds and open continuing care beds, this so-called repurposing. There have been many conversations about what that means. Rural hospitals are certainly at risk. To that list I will also add the Milk River hospital.

Certainly, our government made a commitment to a cardiac catheterization lab at the Lethbridge hospital. I've spoken about that. I've spoken with constituents that I ran into door-knocking who pleaded with me to continue to raise this issue. We require this service. I see it nowhere in these budget papers. If the government is looking for actual good-faith initiatives in terms of improving our public health care system, that might be one. I've met with constituents lately who are very concerned about the availability of dementia care units in southern Alberta and in Lethbridge, family members who have been able to find care, but they are seeing strains in the system, and they are worried about the future of dementia care. Dementia respite care is something that Lethbridge still requires. I just had a meeting with a concerned constituent last week on that matter.

8:30

Certainly, registered nurse supervised intoxic facilities are something that this government has said that they in notional terms are committed to but have yet to make good on.

Supportive housing and wraparound services in our downtown was a commitment that was made under our government. The funding was committed to, yet it has yet to materialize in Lethbridge.

The Lethbridge Chinook hospital emergency doctors are beginning to speak out about the state of our emergency department and what they fear for the future of our ability to meet public health care needs in southern Alberta.

Family physicians are starting to reach out to me and to others about the unilateral changes that have come as a result of this government's actions. They are worried that they are not going to be able to spend more than 10 or 15 minutes with people who have complex care needs. Certainly, we see a number of these folks in Lethbridge, where we struggle with one of the most acute per capita opioid crises in the country and, indeed, on the continent.

Certainly, administration costs have been something that the south zone AHS has taken very seriously, and they are in fact the lowest in the province, as I am briefed. While Alberta, according to CIHI, has the lowest administration cost for a health care system in the country, the south zone is leading on these things, so perhaps instead of the pugilistic tone that the province has set with both AHS and its workers and with its administrations and physicians, it may want to look at those best practices in the south zone and emulate them elsewhere.

Now, the reason why I bring these things up and the reason why it's so important is, first of all, that this bill allows for a number of new approaches to collective bargaining. Certainly I don't believe that, while it may be that if people were interested in good-faith collective bargaining that was not happening inside the media, that was moving along consistent with the principles of the rule of law, consistent with the principles that have been articulated through about three or four Supreme Court decisions on this matter now – it might be that I would have no problem with some of these provisions in Bill 21 in terms of this so-called grade of oversight over collective bargaining with public-sector employees and working with the agencies, boards, and commissions that are ultimately the employer. However, what we've seen from this government, both in action and in word, is an increasingly hostile and arrogant posture with respect to public-sector workers, the majority of whom are women that are under consideration in the health care system and in the education provision, although we're not talking about that right now.

In Lethbridge what we see is that about 1 in 5 dollars in the GDP and about 1 in 5 workers are in fact public-sector workers. This is a large chunk of the economy that are nurses, LPNs, auxiliary nurses, people who work in AHS warehouses, lab techs, physios, occupational therapists, of course counselling therapists, psych nurses, orderlies, maintenance staff. This is to say nothing of our paramedics and hard-working firefighters, who respond when we need them. Bargaining with all of these groups of workers is now a matter of a great deal of unnecessary strife. It introduces an unnecessary amount of stress around kitchen tables in my riding and elsewhere, but I was elected here to stand up for those folks in Lethbridge who are worried about their livelihoods because of this attack on both public-sector workers and the value of their work because of certainly the privatization agenda that drives this and, ultimately, because this government remains committed to undermining our public health care system.

This is why we repeatedly hear the Premier mocking anyone who might raise concerns about our public health care system. No one in Lethbridge elected me not to stand up to that. We all need health care, ultimately, and none of us can afford thousands of dollars out of pocket either for private health insurance or for simply paying out of pocket to jump the queue. Certainly, those of us who would be left behind, that is to say those of us who are not in the 1 per cent, would be left with a much diminished system if indeed this government moves ahead with some of these attacks on public health care.

You know, what we saw on Friday, as a result of this collective bargaining process that is now moving along and some of the changes that are contemplated in Bill 21, is that approximately 7,000 people across the province will lose their jobs. That'll mean hundreds in the city of Lethbridge. Hundreds in the city of Lethbridge. The effects on our small business, on our real estate and housing markets, on our entire economy, which relies on both the public and the private sectors, will be innumerable.

One question that I have had over and over again is: where is the analysis on what will happen to our economy? We have some Disneyland fantasyland analysis of how many jobs will come by magic through the reductions in the corporate income tax rate for already very profitable large corporations, analysis that was, in fact, based on Canadian economic indicators, not Albertan, so it's flawed in the first instance. We have heard that from the province, but what we haven't seen baked in is what their projections are for the slowdown in economic activity, particularly in areas where we see a number of public-sector workers, what that will mean for overall demand in those cities, what it will mean for our housing markets, our property values, and what it will ultimately mean for ordinary people.

Now, I have said at many points in this House before that Lethbridge is known for two things. It is known for students, and it is known for seniors. I notice here a number of changes in the postsecondary system. Before I sit down, I would like to speak to those on behalf of my constituents. Both Lethbridge College and the University of Lethbridge posted record high enrolment this year, the most enrolment they've ever seen. That means approximately, well, at least 6,000 students at U of L. Given the full load equivalent at Lethbridge College and the fact that they have more part-time students, I'm not sure about the numbers there, but I do know that they had record high enrolments at both institutions. What we are seeing here is ending the tuition freeze, so those students will be paying more out of pocket, or their parents will be.

Obviously, that has an effect on Lethbridge families, but it has a profound effect on Calgary families as well. A number of Calgary families send their kids to the University of Lethbridge because it's reasonably close but it's a little bit far away so that, you know, there's a bit of independence there. It's an affordable town to live in. Rental prices are not overly exorbitant like sending, you know, a kid to the Lower Mainland, for example, or places like that. It's a small enough town that kids aren't going to get lost, right? So a lot of Calgary parents send their kids to the U of L for those first couple of years or to Lethbridge College for the first couple of years. What they are going to see now is a massive increase in those costs, not just around tuition but potentially around other costs as well, certainly for student loan interest, increased by 1 per cent, plus ending the tuition tax credits that either students themselves or their parents avail themselves of over the course of a postsecondary degree.

Now, postsecondary is that great leveller. It is a place where international students come, and they decide that they want to stay. Then they achieve their permanent residency, and we are all better off for it. It is a place for kids like me, who grew up in rural Alberta, who had a grand total, I think, on my dad's side of one relative who had ever attended university – none on my mom's side, but my dad's – to actually go and achieve a graduate degree. I went in the Klein years, so there was a student loan there, but still, those things would not be possible without publicly accessible postsecondary education. We did see that that kind of accessibility, particularly for people of more modest backgrounds, lower income kids, working-class kids like me.

Over the course of the Klein years we did see reductions in accessibility. We did see lower participation rates happening in Alberta that were different than in other provinces. We had a distinction, a not very laudable one, of being the jurisdiction with the lowest participation rates and some of the lowest high school completion as well. That path out of high school and into some form of postsecondary education, regardless of what it might be, was simply not available to people as tuition was skyrocketing.

Now, we've been able to stabilize some of those costs. I know that there are many, many working-class people, whether they are newer to Canada, whether they come from lower income backgrounds or they come from backgrounds that are not necessarily lower income but it wasn't sort of done in their family to go to university – I know that bringing down those costs was something that made university more accessible to people, not that everyone should go to university. Far from it. But that made some of those dreams, whether it was to be an engineer or a physician or a nurse, that are only achievable though university education more possible for people.

The Chair: Hon. members, we've got lots of visitors here tonight. Because it's almost Christmas, I would just like to recognize some constituency managers up in the gallery: Tasha Schindel, the constituency manager for Calgary-Acadia; and Miguel Racine, the constituency manager for the hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing. Welcome here. It's a pleasure to have a visible audience. We know there are so many people tuned in online.

With that, I will be seeking additional speakers to the bill. The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Chair: Hon. members, we are still in Committee of the Whole.

Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to Bill 20. I've spoken to this bill a few times, mostly focusing on some of the major concerns to the film industry, also the concerns with the Alberta lottery fund. Today I'm going to be focusing on the Alberta lottery fund and what I've been hearing from constituents as well as Albertans all over the province with their concern about these cuts and the changes in this piece of legislation, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. There are so many agencies and communities across the province, nonprofits that rely heavily on the lottery fund. They have reached out through e-mail, through walking into my office, phone calls, conversations at the grocery store, you name it. People are concerned about what's happening, and they would like to have a voice.

I've been forwarded a document from Vital Signs through the city of Edmonton. They're an organization that is through Edmonton Community Foundation. They're the fourth-largest community foundation in Canada. They help stimulate change and community growth by supporting donors and granting in the following areas: community and social services; arts, culture and heritage; health and wellness; education and learning; environment; recreation and leisure; and social enterprise.

They've compiled a document, where they've done a lot of research through the city of Edmonton, about how some of the programming that is offered in the city impacts Edmontonians, those coming into Edmonton as tourists. We have information about sports and rec that is put on in communities where we know we host many different events, where it's minor soccer or baseball, and communities come to Edmonton to use our facilities. There's a major concern with what's happening in this piece of legislation with the Alberta lottery fund and what communities are going to be eligible to provide to their communities going forward.

I thought I would share some of these incredible statistics that they've compiled through the Edmonton Social Planning Council. Their vital statistics website says that they are an independent non-profit, non-partisan, social research organization. Established in 1940, [they conduct] research and analysis into a wide range of topics, particularly in the areas of low income and poverty. The council's publications and reports provide the public and government with current and accurate information to support informed decision-making.

Now, I would like to think that government perhaps looked at this document, but what I'm hearing across the floor as well as from the community is that there is a sense of not feeling consulted with, not feeling that they were a priority when decisions to cut were made. So I would just like to share some of these incredible statistics. One of them that is quite amazing: it says that 76.3 per cent of Albertans attended an arts event in 2018, so that's saying that Alberta cares about art and they care about what's happening in the province. We have the Alberta Foundation for the Arts, the operational grant recipients. They exceed the population of the province. They're an organization where it is their job to make sure that Albertans have an ability to access art, children are exposed to art in their schools, and their whole philosophy is being able to bring art to Albertans.

We know that when people are coming through the province, we have some incredible museums, and we have beautiful art throughout our cities that showcases Alberta artists. It's amazing. If you just even walk out of the Legislature and down 108th Street, there's glass blown on every single streetlight, and that was done with a local artist here in Edmonton who blows glass and worked with a school in Highlands-Norwood to teach kids how to do that. It's incredible that these young people get this one-on-one time with an artist from Edmonton, and now their art is showcased right here in Edmonton across from our beautiful Legislature, all the way down 108th Street. It's those little things in our city that make it so beautiful, and it's those things that people are really, really nervous about being cut and what happens.

We know that the arts community is very strong in Alberta and that it includes a wide variety of different disciplines like literature, drama, poetry, prose, performing arts, dance, music, theatre, media and visual arts, drawing, painting, filmmaking, architecture, ceramics, sculpting, and photography, just to name a few. There are artists here that are both paid and unpaid. A lot volunteer, give back to the community, but a lot of them also rely on grants that they would have been able to apply for through the Alberta lottery fund, and now that that's going into general revenue, there is a fear that they're no longer going to be able to access that funding.

We know that people in arts community are passionate about sharing their art. There are those perhaps like myself: if I do a piece of art, it's for my own enjoyment in my own home. But there is art that needs to be seen and enjoyed. We know that there's evidence of healthy lifestyles in being exposed to the arts community. Art therapy is something that can help with self-expression, it can manage pain, and it's been proven to reduce fatigue, stress, anxiety.

The 2018-2019 Health Arts Society of Alberta will bring more than 400 professional musicians to perform for elders in care across the province. That, to me, is absolutely amazing, knowing that there are seniors that can enjoy art in their seniors' facility or at their community centre. Knowing that that is something that might be taken away by removing the Alberta lottery fund is a fear that I'm hearing. When we talk about the positive impacts of the arts, we know that it is definitely something that can have an impact on your mental health, on your mood. It's something, whether you're experiencing it or you're doing it, that has a positive impact. It just makes me really nervous that this is something that's going to be potentially taken away.

Talking about equity in the arts, there are parts of the statistics that say that equity in the arts has a long way to go, that women make up 51 per cent of the 650,000 art workers in Canada but represent only 25 per cent of artistic directors. Minority women are more likely to have contract positions and less likely to be in full-time positions of leadership. Now, this is a statistic that I know isn't unique to art, but when we look at the praise and recognition, 72 per cent of directing awards were given to men; 62 per cent of playwright awards were given to men.

The arts community is working at looking through the lens of diversity and equality. This is a great way to empower our young girls to get involved. Arts is such a personal expression. They're taking that leadership and looking at ways to help support girls and women in expressing themselves, so when we have a government that has the status of women and culture under her ministry, this is something that is concerning, that it's not being talked about. It's not being considered, the impacts when we're cutting programs like the Alberta lottery fund. I wonder how much of that lens has been looked at when they're cutting programs like this, the impact on our women and our young girls.

We know that a lot of this legislation impacts people with disabilities. We have 27 per cent of members who are hard of hearing or living with a disability that earned less than $20,000 per year as compared to 18 per cent of able-bodied members in theatre and live performances. My daughter is in postsecondary right now, becoming an interpreter for the deaf. Knowing that she could have a job in assisting someone who's going through an arts program, she is, in essence, going to be exposed to that. I think that when we look at the different jobs that she might have as an interpreter for the deaf community, it's sad to me that perhaps someone that would apply for a grant from the deaf community might not be eligible anymore and might miss out on that opportunity.

We know that there should be a focus on equity and looking at women and people with racially diverse backgrounds and people with different abilities. The arts community is actively looking at that and making sure that this is something that they're addressing when they're going forward with their programming and when they're developing their art structures for the province. I think that it's really important to know that this is something that is being tracked and it's being studied, and we have statistics that show that this is something that's important.

We know that there's a lot of volunteerism that happens in the arts community. While a lot of them are asking for grants, a majority of people come together because they're passionate about this. When we look at the incredible people of Alberta, we know that they're philanthropists and they're people who give back in their community, so taking away the Alberta lottery fund is taking away those opportunities for people to stay engaged as a volunteer in their community.

This Vital Signs statistic shows that an average of 52,000 people volunteer each year to assist the arts in Alberta; 52,000 people are engaged in the arts program here in province. It says:

If volunteers were paid $15 an hour . . .

The minimum wage unless you're a minor or a server.

. . . their labour would be worth more than $28.5 million, equivalent to approximately 14% of the total revenue for the sector in the province.

That's amazing. We have people in this province that want to be engaged. They want to be involved somehow in the arts community. To me, 52,000 people would be impacted if that no longer was an option in the province.

We know that Edmonton and, I'm sure, many other communities across the province invest in art in their city. The city of Edmonton's Percent for Art program allows 1 per cent of the eligible construction budget of any publicly accessible municipal project for the acquisition of art. As of January 2019 there are 233 pieces of completed public art, and 29 are in progress. I think that is absolutely incredible. This is something that Edmonton has prioritized and wants to make sure that Edmontonians and those visiting our beautiful city have access to.

Now, if an artist comes forward and they have a submission and they would like to see something in the city, to know that they can't access that grant funding might mean that we don't have those pieces of art. We have some of the most beautiful art collections here in the province, and to know that that is at risk is something that concerns me, Madam Chair. When we look at the Alberta lottery fund and all of those organizations that rely on it, they're afraid of what that means and how it's going to impact what they do for their programming, the different activities that they do around the city. Art is a big part of that.

The other piece that's part of this statistic document is sports and recreation. I've spoken in the House a lot about being a sports mom. My kids are very involved in community sports. My oldest started with baseball, worked through soccer. All of that was provided through our local community leagues. Who provided those supports? Well, it was volunteers. Community leagues are run by volunteers, who are committed to making sure that people in the community have access to affordable sports, affordable programming, whether it's yoga or painting that's run out of that community hall. But in order to do that, they need funding. They rely on the Alberta lottery fund for a lot of that funding. If that's gone, what happens to our community leagues? What happens to that little league baseball tournament that happens every year in Castle Downs, where families come together? There have been families that continue to come and support and volunteer at the different venues years after their children stop participating in baseball. It's wonderful. It's a way for the community to come together and support one another. But they need their facility, they need their community league itself to do that.

Vital Signs has created some definitions about what they feel sports and recreation are. They've defined active living as "integrating regular exercise and physical activity into one's routine and valuing the physical, social, mental, emotional, and spiritual needs that these pursuits fulfill." We know that being physically active is important at all ages, whether it's your littles and they're learning how to skate or it's your seniors that are out dog walking or mall walking. Castle Downs has a really great community that is involved and is active and is reaching out to the constituents to see what they want. Community leagues are important, and having access to these things is absolutely essential.

We know that 49 per cent of Edmontonians participate in active recreation or organized sports. The main reasons that they've identified for participation: 80 per cent of it is fun and enjoyment;

78 per cent is health and well-being. According to the live active survey among those who are active in the top activities: 29 per cent are walking, running, jogging, hiking; 43 per cent are aerobics; 21 per cent are swimming. There's another statistic here, lack of participation: 51 per cent of Edmontonians did not participate in organized sport or active recreation in the past year. Among those not participating, the reasons are: 32 per cent, time and distance; 26 per cent prefer to spend time on other activities; 16 per cent was health or ability; 10 per cent was cost of activity. Participation in sport and recreation tends to increase as income increases. What this means to me is that those that don't have a lot of extra money aren't able to participate in sports. What community leagues do is that they provide that affordable opportunity to do that through grants and funding through the Alberta lottery fund.

When we see this statistic of 51 per cent of Edmontonians not participating, I would guess that that's probably pretty consistent across the province. When income is a factor, when organizations are no longer able to apply for grants for supports, that means that the cost of those activities is going to go up, which means that those participating are going to reduce. So when we look at those that have a fixed income or even a moderate income, the priority might not be to have their children participate in sports; it might not be the adults wanting to play volleyball. They can't afford it.

The other piece that struck me was the distance, that 32 per cent didn't engage in activities because of the distance. We rely so heavily on community organizations to provide programming that's close to home. When you can just walk down the street to your community league to access basketball or soccer, that reduces the barrier. When you then have to rely on public transportation to get to an activity, participation reduces significantly. My fear and the fear of so many that I'm hearing from is that by taking away programming within communities, you're impacting people's quality of life, their ability to actually participate in some sort of recreation.

We know that more than half, 54 per cent, of Canadian families are financially strained from their kids' extracurricular activities and that one in four, 27 per cent, have gone into debt as a result. So it's important for families to be able to have their children accessing these types of community-based programming, and it's important to the community leagues to be able to offer that.

I know that Castle Downs did a survey in the community, and we asked: "What do you want to see in your community? What's important?" The majority of people said that if they had programming where they could be active, where it was safe for them to do so and affordable, they would do it. What that meant was that Castle Downs had to consider investing in some more infrastructure within the community.

Some of the things that were talked about. You know, people say that you can go for a walk. It's something that's free. You can do it right out of your door. But when the community is saying that they don't feel safe because of poor lighting or access to, let's say, Beaumaris Lake because of the structure collapsing, these are things where the communities rely on provincial governments to help with funding, so that they can do something that's free for them, as simple as walking.

We know that by adding lighting – because we live in a province where it gets dark early, people work and by the time they want to go out after dinner, it's dark. We need to invest in simple things, and as a province we should be supporting communities in doing that. When the constituents are saying, "This is something that's important; this is something that we want to see," I think it's the provincial government's responsibility.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Madam Chair, for the call and to my colleague from Edmonton-Castle Downs for her people-centred commentary on what I think is a bill that is anything but people-centred, other than perhaps people-targeted because it seems like there are many, many attacks on individuals. We always hear about individual responsibility, but I think this is a heightened level of onus put on individual responsibility, something that certainly was not campaigned on in the last election and that, I would say, the government has no mandate to implement.

I'm going to talk about a few of the areas tonight that I haven't had a chance to talk about in great detail. The first one I'm going to touch on is the effects to municipal funding. The government plans to cut grants in lieu by 25 per cent this year, and it's planning to cut them by an additional 25 per cent next year. So grants in lieu: what is that? I'm not sure, maybe it was discussed somewhat at caucus. I doubt it was discussed extensively because I can tell you that municipalities expect people and businesses and government agencies that are in their communities or government buildings that are in their communities to pay for the services that we all receive.

Because one order of government that is subject to another order of government can't impose a tax bill on that order – so a municipality can't issue a tax bill to the provincial government – what has been done for as long as I can remember, Madam Chair, is that the provincial government had a grant in place of taxes. GPOT, I think, they often referred to it as. That grant in place of the tax base was already, arguably, not the full cost of what it would be to issue all of the services to those buildings and the folks who live and work there.

For example, many of us have offices in the Federal Building, and everyone else who doesn't has one in this building. The city plows the roads for us to get from our places of accommodation or permanent residence, whatever it might be, to this building to be able to do the work that we do here. When there are moments of crisis, we call on the city police to come and support us. They aren't here every day, thank goodness, but we know that there are times of crisis where we need to call on the city police, we need to call on local law enforcement, like we experienced just yesterday, Madam Chair. I think it behooves us to contribute to the cost of providing those services that benefit us all.

So these grants in place of taxes in this bill will be cut by 25 per cent this year, an additional 25 per cent next year, not exactly paying our fair share for the services that we receive from the municipality here in Edmonton. There are provincial buildings throughout this province. Many of our municipalities have provincially owned buildings, and they expect that the province will give them this grant in place of taxes, and while they would like it to be higher, they certainly didn't expect that it would be lower, 25 per cent reductions for each of the next two years. That definitely wasn't something that was in the Premier's speech at RMA, for example, or in the platform, that government is going to shirk some of its responsibilities when it comes to paying taxes for the buildings that has.

I think that that is not just a degradation of responsibility, but I'd say that it's quite embarrassing. I'd say that it's something the government – I get why it wasn't in the RMA speech, because I think it's something that probably embarrasses a lot of members, that I imagine many of your municipal and MD and county leaders have spoken to you about.

I know that when there was discussion of this when the government changed in 2015 and I was then minister of seniors, they were concerned that the government might not be paying their taxes on all of the seniors' homes that we had throughout the province. We did what I would argue was the responsible thing and made sure that we paid our taxes. Now here we have a bill that is making it not only legal for the government to continue to cut what they pay in taxes but is downloading those pressures onto the very municipalities that have been counting on these grants in place of taxes.

Another piece is the 9 per cent cut for MSI funding for Calgary and Edmonton – well, isn't that just lovely – the MSI funding that they counted on for many years to provide the municipal sustainability that enables all of us to have the kinds of buildings and amenities and services that we expect. Imagine when folks are here in Edmonton, while they're here for work, that maybe they pop in at a public library or use the bus or the LRT or use a major road to get to and from this place. These are all things that MSI contributed to, and now that's being cut. What's going to happen – we've seen it already happen in this place – is that when Edmonton and Calgary are facing 9 per cent cuts, they're faced with looking at service reductions in excess of that, and of course the majority are people-centred in their budgets as well as in the provincial budgets.

So if you're looking at cuts of that magnitude, you're looking at the kinds of attacks on public services and on the very people who are being attacked further in this bill with what the now Premier has referred to in the past as an insidious tax grab, income bracket creep, right? So here we go. We're going to download things onto municipalities. We're going to download things onto individuals. So that is certainly very frustrating.

There's one little line in here, Mr. Chair. It's just one tiny line in section 10 now, I guess, and it repeals the City Charters Fiscal Framework Act. It just says, "The City Charters Fiscal Framework Act is repealed." It's on page 55 of the bill. When we saw this bill tabled, the next day there were emergency meetings called for many municipalities across this province, and I attended the one here in Edmonton, for at least a portion of it. What the message was, loud and clear: promise made, promise broken.

It was actually in the platform of the now government that they would respect the city charters fiscal framework. Instead, this bill in one line repeals it. Not long to break that promise, that's for sure, and certainly disrespectful to the municipalities who did all of that negotiating in good faith. When they saw that it was in the platforms of both major parties in the last election, they had a great sigh of relief because this is something that had been such an ongoing work for many years, that was landed prior to the last election but committed to by both major parties in the last election. So, of course, there is significant anger and frustration on the part of the municipalities that are dealing with a broken promise yet again.

Yeah. So not paying taxes, breaking funding agreements, reducing the existing funding agreements, and then, of course, we have the addition of the 90-day clause, that has the ability to terminate without cause significant infrastructure projects that our two largest cities have been counting on for years, ones that the now Premier likes to say that he championed, but he's writing in these clauses to break the very commitments that were made by the last government, that he said he would maintain.

I'm going to pivot to some of the other areas that I think in some ways reflect on the very difficult news of this government's credit downgrade earlier today. Moody's brought in a downgrade. I don't celebrate these types of things. I think it's not something that we're excited about. Certainly, I think when the government criticized downgrades in the past, when they were in opposition, they seemed to be celebrating them, and I take no enjoyment in this moment. I want you all to know that. But I'm going to reflect on a few of the pieces in the downgrade that comment on why this has been done and what I think in this bill actually furthers the situation and would lead us to further downgrades if the government doesn't take the advice of Moody's.

There are two areas that I want to refer to. One says that it "reflects Moody's opinion of a structural weakness in the provincial economy that remains concentrated and dependent on non-renewable resources – primarily oil." And it goes on to elaborate on that. So what's being done in this bill to end the structural weakness in the provincial economy? Well, it's actually furthering what Moody's says is a structural weakness, an overdependence on one commodity. Of course, I am very grateful that we have such a strong oil and gas industry, but it can't be our only industry.

Individual Albertans are called upon to diversify their own income regularly. I spoke with an artist just a couple of weeks ago who talked about how she would love to be able to do fine art all day every day, but of course that isn't an option. That wouldn't be a sustainable way to generate income, so she teaches, so she does public pieces, so she does commissioned pieces. You have to take what you've got and find ways to diversify your income base. If somebody who is a very talented fine artist can find ways to diversify her income, I think it certainly would be of benefit for a government that has the responsibility of creating an economy and supporting an economy for more than 4 million people to take that urgency that Moody's is saying around overdependence and structural weakness and diversify.

What's happening instead in this bill? Well, we're seeing the repealing again of different types of things that help support economic diversification. Here's another one: page 60, section 17. It repeals the interactive digital media tax credit. It's repealed upon proclamation. There's another one here, the film and television tax credit: significant changes to that. These are areas of our economy that were growing in recent years. Oh. And, of course, the small brewers, right? These are areas in our economy that were growing in recent years.

Of course, the intent is not to have them replace our primary industry; it's to have them augment the primary industry. Just as back in the time when my grandparents were homesteading, the main industry of the day was agriculture, we still have a very strong agricultural base in this province. But it wasn't sustainable for us to rely on that – or on trapping and fur trading – being our primary and sole industry indefinitely. It's important that as society continues to move forward, we continue to find ways to have a strong base in nonrenewable resources but to expand that into other parts of the economy.

Of course, something that I was proud to support the expansion of was our energy legacy in this province in areas in addition to oil and gas. With the PDP, obviously, we talked about getting full value and greater components out of our raw resources rather than always selling the most basic, raw version of our resources to other jurisdictions to have them upgrade, refine, send it back, and for us to pay a premium on that. Doing that work in Alberta to get better value and more jobs out of our resource was the responsible thing to do, but so was it the responsible thing to do to have the digital media tax credit.

This is an emerging industry and one where we as Albertans, I think, should be at the forefront and not following and looking for the leftovers from other jurisdictions. As well, the film and television industry: I know that any time I see any kind of glimpse of Alberta in a TV show, in a movie, I get excited. I get that sense of pride, and a lot of Albertans do, whether it's the Strathcona farmers' market featured in a number of, you know, holiday movies or our beautiful Canadian Rocky Mountains, and there are other places across this province that get featured from time to time as well. Find ways to expand that, to expand, you know, both the actor, film director, editor sorts of positions but also the many blue-collar jobs that come on those sets as well, what are seen as some of the complementary pieces to the arts. There are a lot of people who work in television and film and in the theatre who really contribute to a diversified economy and the cultural fabric of this province. We are the sum of our many parts, and I definitely feel that this bill is attacking many of the parts that I think were growing and were contributing to a more diversified economy.

Moody's also talks about environmental risk. They talk about risk in relation to oil as well as floods and fires. Again, I think it's important that we act in a more proactive way rather than implementing short-sighted cuts like the cuts on the RAP program. Growing up in the north, I knew a bunch of RAP firefighters personally. I probably saw them from afar and admired them greatly, and there were a lot of kids in our town who, when they grew up, didn't just want to be firefighters; they wanted to be RAP firefighters. They wanted to be the men and women who jumped out of the helicopters and saved the farm or saved that trapline or saved that area of brush or saved your town. That's one of the areas that a lot of kids in the community I grew up in wanted to be a part of, and instead we have a budget that attacks the very programs that have been in place, many of them for decades.

And that's the thing. I think a lot of folks on the other side of the House like to say: well, we were sent here to undo what the NDP did. I would say that that's a very simplistic argument to give. I think there were a number of things that people weren't sending folks here to undo, but, okay, let's say that you buy that simplistic argument, that you're here to undo what was done in the last four years. Well, then, why undo things that have been done for the last 40 years: the RAP program – about 30 years in existence in this province – and a number of initiatives. Oh. And the ATRF: that was something that was set up as joint governance in 1939. You know, this is the same time as many of us hear the stories about our loved ones – my grandfather, for example – getting ready to go off to war. This is something that has been in place for far longer than the four years when there was a different party in power.

The party of today seems to feel that it is important to roll back time in such substantive ways, that I think are causing really deep and damaging impacts on future things. Like, when Moody's looks to see, "Okay; given the last downgrade and the advice that we gave, what's being done to implement those cautionary notes and to actually focus on diversification?" I fear that when they see the impacts of things like Bill 20, it is actually moving in the wrong direction and that it's going to make it more difficult for us, Madam Chair.

With that, I want to express again that I think that two omnibus bills, 20 and 21, that have such sweeping impacts on so many different areas that ordinary folks rely on, are disrespectful at best and, I think, are really damaging to the folks who rely on these programs. At the same time that we're telling people, "You can't get your tax credit anymore for your tuition, tuition that you've been saving up for and paying and struggling with, but we have the money to spend on things like flights to other jurisdictions for folks who work in the Premier's office," you know, I think that we have some questions to ask about what our priorities are and how it is that we're going to make sure that we support the diversification that I think everyone deserves in this province. Again, I find these measures in this budget very regressive and far beyond the scope of what was campaigned on and what the mandate was given for.

Those are some of the comments I wanted to share with regard to Bill 20 at this point tonight. Perhaps there will be more later, but at this point those are my primary areas of concern that I wanted to highlight for my colleagues, again, those being the shirking of responsibility to pay taxes to municipalities; the cutting of major grants, including MSI, to municipalities; the shredding of the cities charter, that was committed to in the platforms of both political parties, certainly committed to in the government platform; the tax credits that would have moved us forward being eliminated, which I believe will move us backwards; and the attacks on tax credits for ordinary folks through the tuition tax credit elimination.

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise in the House to speak to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. I think this is my first time speaking to this bill. Looking at the bill, some of the changes being proposed in the bill are quite disturbing. It's very obvious that I won't be able to support this bill.

Of the changes this bill proposes, the very first thing I was looking at is the impact of ending the interactive digital media tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, the community economic tax credit, the Alberta investor tax credit, and the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. Looking at all those changes being proposed, I would say that this seems to be a very short-sighted, ideological, partisan decision that in no way is going to support economic prosperity, and definitely it will have an adverse effect moving forward to diversify our economy.

I would also say that this was a lost opportunity, that there was huge potential in this sector in Alberta. It could grow and help diversify the economy, and by this government's proposal Alberta will lose the huge potential in growing, I will say, the film industry. I really wanted to actually share a quote from one of the employers in this sector, Keith Warner. Keith Warner, whose video game studio, New World North, opened earlier this year and now employs 26 people and has some more positions still to be filled, said: it was a bitter pill for me to swallow; I will be honest; I was pretty upset.

The other thing, one more change I wanted to actually emphasize in this bill, is taking into consideration the end of the lottery fund. The government is going to move the money into the general revenue fund. Before coming to take on my new role after the general election in April, I was lucky to have the experience to be able to work with a number of community organizations and personally know many of those individuals who work day and night to keep those organizations going. They do volunteer work without any compensation after going to work from 9 to 5, and they give spare time, that they can easily choose to spend with family or doing some other activities, to try to help build the communities through those organizations by going and providing a platform in the communities to help promote local talent, bring communities together, build bridges between communities, and, not only that, also integrate those cultures into the larger Canadian mosaic.

Those are organizations that do fund raise in the communities. They do spend their volunteer time there, and they also, you know, depend on the funding from the lottery funds. Moving these funds to general revenue has actually created so much uncertainty for all those individuals. They deserve to have that funding from their government. On the contrary, the government has said that the government will still be supporting those programs, but there's a lack of information. There is nothing specific to back up the government's claim. Those, you know, members of the organizations, of the communities cannot rely on the word that our government is actually claiming.

One of the other aspects that I just wanted to speak about: the government is actually proposing a change to child tax credits. They are rolling the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit into a single Alberta child and family benefit. By doing that, this is going to impact big time on Alberta families. The new Alberta child and family benefit will reduce – 465,000 Albertans will be impacted by this new income threshold. This includes 55,000 Albertans who will lose the benefit entirely. This is not a small number. You know, once again I just want to reiterate: 55,000 people who now receive these benefits will not be eligible to receive the benefits entirely if this bill is passed.

The other, you know, very disturbing thing. I was looking at the kind of change this is proposing. Families with a $26,000 net income: how much can you assume that it does these days? To pay your mortgage, pay your rent, that even accounts for nearly $12,000 to $18,000, $20,000. How much is left to take care of the well-being of the family or to put food on the table for the children, for the family? When the government worked on this, I don't know what kind of consultation they have done, what kind of work they have done, what kind of homework they have done on this. This is very disturbing news. The people making an income in the range of $26,000, net family income, will be impacted by this, and the people, the families whose net income is more than $41,000 or $43,000 will lose the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta child and family tax credit base. These are the kinds of changes I'm looking at being proposed by this bill.

It's for sure that there's no way that we can support this bill. I'm going to be, actually, very brief. I have more to say on this bill. I was going to link some of the information to moving the lottery fund into general revenue. The government says, you know, that they will still back up those programs. I have spent, like, six months asking these questions many times to the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women. She is not even sure and not even clear on the cuts the ministry is – actually, it's already cut. They have cut the community facility enhancement program. The community initiatives program has been cut 35 per cent and the other program by 8 per cent. The question has been raised many times that the worst impact that that is going to have is going to be on the community organizations. Not only this, but a number of people from the organizations are coming to our office and sharing their concerns. Their applications for these grants are being declined, and now they are going to lose even their dependency on the lottery fund. That's very concerning.

For those reasons, I actually oppose this bill and also, you know, urge the government members of this House to give more time and think again, take a thorough look at the kind of changes being proposed. This is going to hurt everyday Albertans. This is going to hurt some of the very important work being done in our communities, and this is a lost opportunity of the potential we had, actually, to grow the film industry.

Thank you, Madam Chair. With these comments, thank you once again.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity tonight to rise and speak to Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. This essentially is a budget bill.

It's not the budget bill, but a large portion of what we see going on within this bill is, as is stated right there in the title, fiscal measures and taxation to help achieve this government's ends.

I want to reflect a little bit on what I've been hearing and seeing from this government in terms of how they view going about achieving a budget balance, about how they view achieving what they feel needs to be a flushing out, shall we say, of government waste or red tape or debt and deficit. Indeed, it was I believe the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction that offered this House a fairly colourful analogy of how he viewed that process taking place and his thoughts on the concerns that we've raised as the Official Opposition about the manner in which this government has been going about its promise to balance the budget while attempting to also backfill, of course, the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate giveaway. That minister rose in this House – and I quote from the eternal words of Hansard, to which this minister so kindly donated his careful thoughts. He said, “Now, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to lose their minds over what we're doing in this session over one bill, I can't imagine how they're going to handle the fact that we're about to give this government a giant enema.”

Now, as much as some might not want to dwell on that particular metaphor from this particular minister, I want to stop and take it apart a little bit. The first thing that strikes me about this minister's metaphor about this government's budget and indeed about the pieces that we see contained here in Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, is the crudity, the fact that it is not only certainly crude in many ways, as folks noted on social media and certainly have commented on since – it was perhaps, some would say, in poor taste – but crude also just in the ignorant simplicity with which the minister chose to express himself and chose to express the idea about how we'd deal with what is, in fact, a challenging and complex reality.

Secondly, I would reflect on the cruelty of the minister's analogy. The manner in which the minister brought this forward and suggested this particular medical operation to aid in what he feels is a significant problem with the government is one of brute force. That goes back to the crudity but does also speak to sort of this government's general approach, which is to bully its way through, to force things from the top down or, perhaps in this analogy, from the bottom up. It is not a question of co-operative or thoughtful action. It's not a question of careful and considered. It's a question of simply imposing, forcing, and, some might say, attacking.

Lastly, what struck me about the analogy is its idiocy, Mr. Chair, simply in that what the minister was proposing is not a practical or reasonable solution to the actual problem. Now, admittedly, it's a short-term solution. Certainly, it's one that is going to yield very rapid and probably a lot of results but, frankly, utterly fails to address the actual underlying problem.

Of course, again, that's what we see with this government and with the kind of measures that they're putting forward here in Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, the sort of approach they are taking with, say, a system as complex as health care, which in itself is not unlike a living being in its complexity and all the different parts that have to work together to make that system work, a system that is indeed much greater than the sum of its parts. What we have here is the minister proposing a very flashy, incredibly messy, and very ill-thought-out solution to a problem that he's barely considered and understood.

Now, if we were to talk to any medical doctor about how they would want to help out a patient who is dealing with this kind of situation, who is dealing with a chronic health issue like this, say, dealing with, shall we say, to not be quite as crude as the member, a chronic blockage. Any decent physician is going to sit down and actually talk with the patient, assess the problem. What are the root issues that led to the situation that the person finds themselves in? What are their eating habits? What are their sleeping habits? Is this individual getting much exercise? What's the environment they're living in? What are the other things they are experiencing? The doctor is not going to come in and, as the minister suggests, try to ramrod through a solution. They're going to actually sit down and consider and try to identify: how did we get into the condition that we are in now?

Now, admittedly, Mr. Chair, there are Conservatives who do this, who actually approach complex policy problems and complex systems of government and issues that need to be dealt with within a government system in a thoughtful way. Certainly, the more moderate, progressive, and thoughtful Conservatives do tend to do that. I have known and I have seen those individuals, and it's appreciated. But those of a more reactionary and ideological bent, when they approach these sorts of situations, always seem to fall into the temptation of trying to frame it as a moral judgment, as a failing of character: if only this individual had been more disciplined in their diet, if only they had exercised more, if only they weren't so lazy and unmotivated. Often the unsaid subtext is: if only they were more like me.

Now, Mr. Chair, to bring this all back around to what we are talking about here, Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, and indeed the proposal of a budget that this government has put forward and indeed its overall approach to how it wants to bring Alberta's fiscal house into order, the analogy that we saw from the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction in that the solution to this problem is “to give this government a giant enema” reveals much more of the ignorant thinking and much less of the thoughtful and considered. Indeed, you consider the great damage that could be done if you try to embark on your solutions in such a way from a medical or a political policy standpoint. You are more likely to do far greater harm than you are to do good or achieve your ends.

You're not achieving a long-term solution. You're not, in fact, actually altering anything about the habits that got you into that situation to begin with. Indeed, we've seen that with previous Conservative governments in Alberta that have come in preaching this kind of rhetoric about how they at long last were going to be the ones who were going to bring this fiscal order into this House. They were going to be the ones to finally reconfigure the health care system in a way that worked efficiently. They were going to be the saviours of Alberta.

Mr. Chair, here we are again, and we have no new ideas at the table. We have these same tired tropes, the same utter failure to actually address root issues, to consider the real problems. Rather than sit down and actually work with the individuals involved in these complex systems, with the people that make up the political body that is our government, the folks that are running our health care systems, all the other people that are part of this system here in the province of Alberta, to work to improve and change habits, to work to find better ways to do things to address what are the root issues that come with this – how did we get here? – no, their solution is to, in the words of the associate minister, “give this government a giant enema.”

That says it all to me right there, the lack of thought, the lack of consideration, the utter failure to understand the thoughtful and careful work that should go into this to bring our House, indeed, into better fiscal balance. And indeed – and I'm not one to dance on a grave, but it's unfortunate – we saw today what Moody's thinks of this government's plan so far. This credit downgrade that the province received today indicates that with the solution that this government has brought forward, its $4.7 billion corporate giveaway, its intention to ramrod through reform at lightning speed, to blast through its policy with a firehose, they aren't impressed. They see the fact that this government is on track to pretty much the same level of debt that it stands in this House and decries every day and judges our government for having had the moral failing to run towards – they're driving towards that exact same fiscal cliff, Mr. Chair.

Moody's is looking at the fact that this government, in fact, has a higher deficit this year than our government projected. Again, this is all part and parcel of Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, which is enacting measures to support that budget and this government's plan that is driving to over $90 billion in debt.

The question is: who's going to pay? The question is: is the patient going to survive the procedure? Are we going to come out of this at the end of this government's first term with Alberta on a stronger footing in the sense that it has actually built a more resilient approach, a more resilient economy, better fiscal habits and looking after all Albertans as opposed to simply trying to rocket through reforms, make wild cuts in hopes that the elaborate shell game which this Premier and his ministers are choosing to play with funding will yield numbers that they can hide behind for the next provincial election.

What we see with Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, is exactly those sorts of ill-thought-out actions, not addressing actual systemic issues, not actually working with folks to move things forward. Instead, we see this government driving personal income taxes up, something which they did not campaign on, something on which they are one hundred per cent lacking in even telling a half-truth. We see them leading to higher property taxes in our municipalities. We see millions lost in the film and television industry, investments in jobs, as they have fumbled their initial introduction of the film tax credit. Indeed, we see more of the sort of moral judgment that this government likes to rain on everyone else while refusing to train it on themselves.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs having said that in this bill – as was noted by my colleague from Edmonton-Glenora, there is a single line which breaks the promise this government made, yet another area where the UCP platform utterly misled Albertans, that they would respect the city charters that had been carefully negotiated and discussed with Edmonton and Calgary. That minister stood in this House and said that he had to do it, Mr. Chair, that he had no choice but to be utterly disingenuous, to utterly betray their campaign promise, that he was forced by our government.

What we see, Mr. Chair, is that, instead, this government is simply bent on running headlong into its own ideological judgment, its own reckless spending, its own debt. It's just simply choosing to put it somewhere else in the hope and the prayer that maybe someday that $4.7 billion corporate giveaway might create a job. It hasn't yet. We'll wait with bated breath. In the meantime we've seen that what we are left with are these ill-thought-out measures cancelling tax credits that had brought Edmonton, in part, helped to bring Edmonton, to now being ranked as the 10th tech city in the world.

Now those credits are gone, part of this government's giant enema, courtesy of this Premier and his cabinet, just as a part of which now we've seen a thousand jobs that were flushed out of Calgary as this Premier is continuing to stoke isolationist rhetoric and create a fiscal environment that does not help the tech industry, creating an environment where people are not wanting to create jobs and, in fact, are not creating jobs.

I think I've had a lot to say on this bill. I've had a lot to say about the disingenuity of the government, the crudity of its methods, the top-down, dictatorial, condescending manner in which they're going about imposing their will on the province. I know we're nearing the end of this session and the passage of these bills. Well, this government will have the opportunity, I guess, to go forward and try to prove to Albertans that they are going to achieve what they said that they were going to achieve. So far I can say, Mr. Chair, that they have not convinced me. They have not convinced the folks in Moody's. I can tell you that, based on a lot of the actions they've taken this weekend, over the last couple of weeks – firing the Election Commissioner that was investigating them with no justification, jeopardizing thousands of jobs across the province for folks that are providing public front-line health care, driving out tech industries, all these things – there are a lot of Albertans that aren't convinced either.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to Bill 20? I see the hon. Government House Leader has risen.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. First, I'll move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Government House Leader again.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you again, Mr. Chair. First off, in order to move to Bill 26, which is the plan, I move the following motion, that the committee rescind the motion to report progress on Bill 26 that happened before the supper hour.

[Motion carried]

Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: For the purposes of this, we will be dealing strictly with sections 1(3) and 2(2). Are there any comments or questions? We are currently on A1. I see the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has risen.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to have the opportunity – and I certainly want to thank my colleagues for giving me the opportunity – to rise to speak to this bill in committee and also to be able to rise and speak to this particular amendment that was put forward by I believe the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, who is also the Official Opposition labour critic.

This amendment proposes to change the provision in this bill that would remove the mandatory nature of workers' compensation coverage from the previous regime governing the employment circumstances of farm workers. What it would propose to do is suggest that, well, if you're going to remove the mandatory nature of workers' compensation for this particular subset of employees – because, of course, what we've learned here is that, really, this bill has removed workers' compensation and employment standards protection from the vast majority of workers employed in the task of providing agricultural services to farmers. But for that small group that remains that still has access to some form of compensatory coverage, they no longer by matter of right have access to workers' compensation. Instead, the employer, typically a much larger employer, can choose to forgo workers' compensation coverage and instead have some form of private disability provider.

We are proposing a relatively minor change here. Obviously, we wouldn't do any of this stuff. Let me begin by saying, of course, that I think it's a gross violation of human rights and general belief in the right of people to be able to care for themselves and/or their families should they be injured at work in what is without question a very unsafe and injury-prone occupation. Frankly, this decision to remove from these people the basic protection provided by workers' compensation is really quite cruel and very much dismissive of the well-being of a very large group of working people who are also, at the same time, amongst the most vulnerable in any employment sector in this province.

But that is the decision, that is the choice that these members have made, that they do not want to provide basic rights and protections for one of the most vulnerable groups of working people in this province. That is apparently not part of their value system. Therefore, we are very much limiting the group of people who might have any access, in fact, to these types of protections, and within that small group of people we are also removing their right to have access, particularly, to workers' compensation. Instead, their employer gets to choose between workers' compensation and private insurance. We would suggest, therefore, that if we are going to have this ridiculous situation, then at the very least – and that's what this amendment is geared towards – alternative private insurance be effectively equivalent to what that worker might receive were they eligible for workers' compensation.

Why should we do this? Now, as some folks in this House might know, one of the areas of law that I used to practise – you know, there's a larger area around labour relations and labour rights, but one subset of it was, of course, health and safety and workers' compensation and disability law, so I have a fair amount of knowledge in this area. People here will remember that it's certainly not difficult for me to go into a rather long debate over the shortcomings of workers' compensation, and indeed that was why our government worked very hard to improve some of the very unjust elements that existed within workers' compensation. The irony of all this is that what I can say is that nine times out of 10 workers' compensation actually provides better coverage than private insurance because, in fact, I have dealt with both regimes.

What is it that workers get if they are very – well, let me just back up a bit and let me just talk a little bit about, you know, what it's like on a farm and some of the kinds of hazards that people can be exposed to on a farm. You know, I grew up about six hours north of Edmonton. My very, very, very first job, that I did not last long in – I think it was at most two days – was working in a market garden when I was about 13, picking vegetables. To be quite fair, I was pretty wimpy, and after two days of picking these vegetables, I had sunstroke and sunburn and all the things and I was practically passing out and I whined incredibly to my parents.

So I moved on to my second ever summer job, which was working in a honey-making place and working with bees and scraping the wax and the honey off the frames as they came through. We worked in this little shed on what was essentially a farm. It was running around 40 degrees, and I spent the whole day running away from bees. As you can imagine, there were hundreds of thousands of bees in this building, and all I did was run around away from them. Needless to say, it wasn't my most successful day at work either. The third day or fourth day I actually moved on to waiting tables, and that actually took and I did that for the next few years. That being aside, I quickly learned that it's not hard to become ill or get injured when I was working in the market garden.

Now, at the same time, you know, I was pleased to be sort of a token member of one of my parents' closest family friends' family, and they ran a ranch and a farm. It was a very big farm, very big ranch. I used to stay there sometimes for great lengths of time during the summer. The first time I learned to ride a horse, the first time that I learned to drive a vehicle I was about nine years old driving around the fields. I'm sure many people recall that. I remember, you know, jumping into haystacks, all that kind of good fun. I also remember going camping for the first time when I was about 10 years old and literally running back to the house being chased by a bear very late at night. A great place to grow up.

The fact of the matter is, though, that they were very good farmers, very, very responsible farmers, although right now it doesn't sound like they were the most responsible parents, but I feel it worked out well in the end. Nonetheless, the fabulous patriarch of the family, who was one of the most successful farmers, I would suggest, in the whole area, when he was in his, I think, early 70s had what happens to many farmers. You know, he was working a long day and tripped and got his foot caught in the auger and lost two-thirds of his foot and ultimately ended up being in the hospital for quite some time. It took some time before he was able to recover because, in fact, as a result of the surgery he ended up getting an inner-ear infection. It took him about two years before he could actually drive and ride horses again and do all that kind of stuff. To be clear, he loved riding horses because, in addition to farming and ranching, they also raised horses and they raced horses. He was an incredibly effective and talented rider, but it took him a couple of years before he could get back on a horse. Anyway, he eventually did.

He owned this place. He loved it. It was in his bones. He was born there, raised there, died there. In fact, in terms of dying there, ultimately, a few years later, actually, quite some years later – I guess he was pushing 90 at the time – he was out chasing cattle in his vehicle and was driving around the hills of the Peace River, the banks of the Peace River, and made a mistake in judgment, got too close to the edge, where it was too steep going down into the river valley, and lost control of the vehicle. It started careening from the top of the river valley down to the bottom. If anybody doesn't know the Peace River valley, it's about twice the size of the North Saskatchewan, so it's kind of a big drop. He hurled himself out of the truck and then walked six kilometres back to the farmhouse where they immediately took him to the hospital, where he stayed for the next several weeks before he ultimately died.

These are things that can happen on farms, whether you are the owner or whether you are the worker, whether you are one of the best farmers in the community and you have done it for 90 years or whether you are a temporary worker who's been brought up from Mexico to work during the harvest for five months. Let me be clear. There are lots and lots and lots and lots of folks who fall into that latter category. If you are injured, it matters what kind of compensation you have access to. The fellow that I was describing, at that point, I mean, as I said, they were very, very, very successful. They didn't have to worry about their income when he was not able to work anymore, but people who work and rely solely on a wage – and we'll talk in the next amendment about whether or not they actually get to have a wage – need every cent. If they are injured, they need compensation.

Workers' compensation provides, especially for lower income workers, which farm workers definitely are, essentially full wage replacement. They provide it for as long as the condition that has arisen from the injury requires active treatment. It could be something that lasts for two weeks, or it could be a form of compensation that lasts for four years. In the case of the person that I just described, this family friend who struggled, who had imbalance problems as a result of the surgery after he lost two-thirds of his foot, he actually was not back to a place of being fully able to work again for over two years. Had he been receiving workers' compensation benefits, he would have had his income replaced, or if it was an employee that had had that problem instead of him, he would have had his income replaced throughout that whole time.

What else would he have gotten? Well, he would have gotten physiotherapy. He would have gotten, in some cases, accelerated health care. He would have gotten access to a whole wide range of rehabilitative service. He would have gotten access to counselling. Had it been that he was never actually able to go back to that type of work, he also would have gotten access to retraining and retraining options. In addition, if he'd been left with a permanent pension, he would have also ended up with a lump sum payment or an ongoing pension for the rest of his life. Had he not survived or had it been the second accident that I just described, if he had children either under the age of 18 or actively in postsecondary education, they would have received an orphans' benefit, and his wife or spouse or partner would have received a lifelong pension as a survivor. That's what would happen under worker's compensation.

Under private insurance, though, private insurance arrangements can involve as little as a one-time $20,000 payout. They don't necessarily involve regularized income replacement. If they do, they do so at a highly, highly discounted rate. Moreover, they have arbitrary end dates regardless of whether the injury is still in play, whether there is still a disability. In many cases they don't have any kind of long-term impairment pension or long-term impairment payout. In addition, survivors or family don't have access to benefits should the person actually die, nor does the surviving spouse. They definitely never look at retraining or rehabilitation. They don't provide those things.

The question then arises: why? Why are we going to invite these vulnerable, low-paid workers who happen to work in one of the most unsafe occupations, statistically speaking – this is not a value judgment. This is just statistically speaking. Heaven forbid, look at the evidence. That's where the evidence is. One of the most unsafe occupations. Why would we have these vulnerable workers exempted from having the fulsome protection or quasi-fulsome protection, at least, the most fulsome protection available, anyway, offered by the WCB and allow employers or invite employers to replace it with what is a fraction of that amount of protection? Why? Why would you do that?

Now, I don't have to spend a lot of time asking why. It's very clear who folks in this government support and who they do not, who they think are second-class citizens and who they do not. It's very clear that those who are vulnerable, I think, basically from the perspective of those on the other side, are vulnerable for a reason and it's their fault and it's certainly not the job of anyone in government to stand up for them. In fact, it is part of a strategy to make them more vulnerable, and somehow that's going to create economic growth. I think most people would argue that that's a complete fallacy, and there's a plethora of evidence out there to suggest that really it is an antieconomic growth strategy. Really, it's just cruel and in many cases a breach of fundamental human rights.

Nonetheless, I can't speculate exactly why it is that members opposite would adopt this approach. I would, however, urge them to reconsider. I would urge them to, at the very least, for that small subset of farm workers that will still have access to this benefit because, of course, you are actually exempting the vast majority of farm workers from any of this. Of course, those folks will just get to go off and sue their employers, but in the meantime you will be exempting these farm workers from this kind of protection. I would suggest that that does not help the economy, it does not help those workers, it does not help job creation, it does not help the overall quality of life of people in our communities, and it is a short-sighted and mean-spirited approach that can be easily remedied by accepting this amendment that was thoughtfully put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Mills Woods.

I would urge members opposite to consider supporting this thoughtful amendment put forward by the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods because to do otherwise would be to engage in an almost spiteful kind of attack on a very vulnerable group of workers for no apparent outcome other than to ensure that they or their families suffer more should they be so unlucky as to be injured on a farm. It is with that in mind that I would urge my colleagues in this Legislature to give second thought and to consider voting in favour of this amendment designed to provide greater protections to vulnerable farm workers here in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to amendment A1? Seeing none.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A1 lost]

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: Moving to Bill 26 proper with regard to sections 1(3) and 2(2), I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen to speak.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to rise in Committee of the Whole to speak to some of the aspects of Bill 26, a bill that I very strongly disagree with in certain key areas, so I will speak to that disagreement. I will start by talking briefly about the section around the fact that workers on 80 per cent of farms in Alberta will not have access to mandatory workers' compensation coverage, coverage that provides workers with not only assistance with their injury but compensation, medical aid when medical aid is needed, rehabilitation, and economic loss payments, meaning that if someone is no longer able to earn a wage, it will be compensated to them.

We now have the data on that workers' compensation coverage for the past three years, as it has been mandatory here in Alberta, and we know that there have been a significant number of lost time claims, disabling injury claims throughout the province. In 2016 we had 415 disabling injury claims, in 2017 we had 441, and in 2018 we had 473. These were all instances where workers experienced significant injury, a disabling injury, and received compensation and help to get back to work. At the same time their employer was provided with a system that would help to get their worker whole and hardy and back to work again and also would make sure that there was not a private lawsuit that would potentially jeopardize their business operation or in many cases the family home, the family farm. That system, based on the agreement between employers and workers to make sure that there were no lawsuits but there was appropriate compensation, I think, is incredibly important.

One of the key concerns with Bill 26 is that it is deferring to regulation what type of private industry coverage could be granted to workers. We just debated and voted on an amendment that would have moved more clarity into the bill proper. Certainly, it is a strong concern to me that workers will not have the compensation that they deserve, workers that are working in an industry that statistically we know has greater injury rates and greater death rates than in other industries, and we consistently see that through the statistics that are released through the Alberta labour department. It's something that we often remark on when the day of mourning comes around and we remember the workers who have lost their lives, because there have been for the past many years a number of agricultural workers counted among those numbers.

I think it's really important that I stand and object to the change around insurance compensation and particularly the fact that in this bill it defers to regulation making sure that there's adequate protection not only for workers but also for employers. We will, when those regulations are completed and published, be looking to see that there are some important standards placed around that to make sure that workers who are injured as they're trying to provide for their family get compensation, get rehabilitation, that they so importantly deserve.

The other aspect is that through the workers' compensation system we've had data and reporting on injuries that before we didn't have an ideal way to track. WCB and occupational health and safety work with our medical professionals to try and track through admissions into hospitals and through other measures to get a sense of injury rates. Prior to the original change to bring the agricultural industry under workers' compensation, that data was spotty at best. Over the past three years we've actually got more information about the types of injuries, and that allows us to be more proactive and work with organizations like AgSafe, which is founded by 29 producer groups and is working to improve education and awareness. I certainly would encourage this government to continue to support the AgSafe coalition and continue to support improving health and safety in this important industry. I've started my remarks by talking about that workers' compensation piece.

I would now like to change tack and talk just a little bit about another section of the bill that essentially exempts entirely workers at 80 per cent of the farms in Alberta from minimum employment standards. Now, employment standards are those minimum rules and conditions for employment in Alberta. With the changes in Bill 26 workers at 80 per cent of the farms in our province will no longer have those minimum standards.

Now, where we had been at with employment standards is through the consultation process working with technical working groups and consulting widely with Albertans looking to find that right balance between employment standards, regulations that apply widely throughout Alberta, and specifically in farming and ranching. In employment standards on farms and ranches there had been already a number of very special rules made that only applied to wage nonfamily workers. Hours of work and overtime did not apply, general holiday pay was specifically calculated, and importantly, rest periods were acknowledged, where employees were entitled to four days of rest for every 28 days of work.

Some of those accommodations I think were really important, but also with employment standards coverage workers in our agricultural fields could have job-protected leaves after 90 days of work. One of the things that Bill 26 does is it removes that job protection for leaves. I really want to flag that these are leaves that the workers themselves are paying into and are part of our federal employment insurance system. That includes everything from maternity leave and parental leave to critical illness of a child leave. We spoke quite a bit about the critical illness of a child leave when the job protection for that was originally brought in here in this province because Alberta did not have job protection as part of its employment standards.

That change was made in 2017, and we talked quite a bit about a young, single mother in Lethbridge who had a child diagnosed with cancer, went to take the federally provided critical illness of a child leave, something that she fully qualified for, but because employment standards protections providing job protection to that mother were not available in Alberta, because the employment standards legislation was 30 years old at that point, that young mother was fired from her job rather than having her job held. Please keep in mind that the leave she was asking for was completely unpaid on the part of the employer. She was simply asking to not lose her job while she cared for her critically ill child.

That exact scenario can now happen for workers in the agricultural field because now the minimum employment standards that protect minimum wage, unpaid job-protected leaves, vacation, vacation pay, payment of earnings – and I can tell you from my time as a minister in this province that a strong majority of employment standards complaints often end up being about wages, whether it be total nonpayment or just disputes around payment of wages. That workers on 80 per cent of farms in our province won't have access to employment standards to help resolve disputes, when there may be one that arises, I think is really unfortunate in this province.

I would note that the employment standards system is not a combative one. Generally speaking 81 per cent – 81 per cent – so 4 out of 5 times employment standards complaints are resolved voluntarily. Very rarely does it need to become an investigation or to become something that involves an employment standards officer contacting employers. But having that protection when a worker is not getting the compensation they deserve, particularly when the alternative is to then go through the court systems, when our justice systems, as I've understood the debate in this House, are not getting the resources that they need. How long will a worker need to wait for a paycheck that they are owed?

I think those basic protections are really important, and I really want to emphasize that the general trend around employment standards in the agricultural industry in Canada has been to improve and extend protections, not to take them away. Alberta is moving against the trend in Canada by now removing employment standards protections that are very important to so many families and give them access to people who will help enforce minimum standards and give them even just basic things like termination notice and termination pay. I will repeat again that employment standards are minimum safety standards, and workers on 80 per cent of farms will no longer have that under Bill 26. I strongly object to that.

In light of that, I am going to move an amendment at this point, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I've taken a quick look at it. If you could please just read it quickly into the record and then continue with your statements.

Ms Gray: I move that Bill 26, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, be amended in section 2(2) by striking out clause (a). What this change does, for those who do not want to flip directly through Bill 26, is it simply continues the employment standards protections for wage, nonfamily workers on farms and ranches to be the same as what they are today, standards that acknowledge the unique nature of farms and ranches, standards that only apply in a few specific categories, which are minimum wage, job-protected leaves, vacation and vacation pay, payment of earnings, termination notice and termination pay, administration, and enforcement.

So a high-level summary: these workers would continue to have the ability to contact employment standards when there is a dispute with their employer, to access voluntary resolution but also potentially more support when needed to make sure that wages owed to them would be paid. It also brings them back to having that minimum wage to make sure that they are paid at the very least $15 per hour or $13 per hour if they are a student, under the changes this government has brought in.

I would at this point conclude my remarks and simply urge all members to support this amendment that simply seeks to provide minimum employment standards protections that acknowledge the uniqueness of farms and ranches back to the workers at 80 per cent of the farms and ranches in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members who wish to speak to this amendment? Just for clarity, we will be referring to this amendment as A2. The hon. Official Opposition leader.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm again pleased to be able to rise to speak to this amendment. Let me begin by thanking the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods for bringing in this thoughtful amendment. It's more than thoughtful. It is critical. It's life saving. It is ensuring that Alberta maintains the kind of basic human rights you would expect to see in any democratic country anywhere. It is an effort to stop a disingenuous rollback of rights to far, far, far lower rights than we saw before our government brought in Bill 6 in late 2015.

Let me just start with that. I mean, absolutely, the members opposite ran on the platform of reversing the changes that we made through Bill 6 back in late 2015. Now, I actually think that it was an incredibly backward and thoughtless decision to run on this particular plan because, of course, even though there was, without question, a great deal of uproar over our introduction of Bill 6, our government worked diligently and, I would argue, responsibly and very pragmatically with a broad range of stakeholders within the agricultural sector in order to accommodate the unique business and operational needs of farmers while still ensuring that Alberta workers would take their rightful place alongside other farm workers throughout the rest of the country as being, well, you know, humans who were entitled to the basic rights that generally humans are typically entitled to. It seemed like an unnecessary rush to undo all that we had managed to accomplish in terms of accommodating the needs of farmers while at the same time protecting a profoundly vulnerable group of workers. Nonetheless, that's what they chose to run on, so when we saw this Bill 26 come forward as an act to undo all that we had done to protect those farm workers, we were not surprised.

We were surprised, though, when we really dug into it. Of course, it took us a little bit more time to dig into it because we were not afforded the typical privilege of getting briefed. When we were finally able to dig into it, we discovered that this bill actually goes much further than simply taking us back to pre Bill 6 times. In the past although workers in the agricultural sector did not have health and safety protection – and to be fair, they still, I think, retain that health and safety protection, so that is a good thing – they had the protection of very, very, very basic employee rights prior to Bill 6. They didn't have the protections around most hours of work rights. They didn't get overtime. They didn't get holidays. They didn't get much termination pay. They didn't get any of those kinds of things, but they did have the fundamental right to be paid for their work. Now that doesn't exist anymore. So that is quite a step backward.

I understand from the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods that it has been suggested that this simply maps onto the New Brunswick regime. Well, we've taken the time to look at the New Brunswick regime, and let me just say that it does not map onto the New Brunswick regime. Interestingly, in a discussion paper published by the New Brunswick ministry of labour in 2016, they described the situation that they had there, and they said that they had this very strange situation where they were exempting small farms, much in the same way that this minister is trying to do, but it was a smaller group. Rather than five or fewer employees that are employed for longer than six months, it was three or fewer employees who are employed for longer than six months. They said, you know, that the strange thing about this is that here we have these, quote, unquote, long-term employees, i.e. the employees who were employed for six months or longer, who are exempted from the New Brunswick employment standards code even while the shorter term employees, the harvesters, enjoyed the benefits of the coverage. They said: this is a very strange thing, and we should fix this; we don't understand why this is the case. But that is the way their legislation was interpreted.

Anyway, what that shows is that it is a very different situation here. The way this bill has been constructed by the drafters is that it exempts the employees themselves from any coverage at all from the Employment Standards Code, which means not just those employees with six or more months of service but any employees who work for that employer are exempted now from coverage under the Employment Standards Code. So if you're taking the seasonal employees and saying that they don't get the benefit of the Employment Standards Code and that those with five or fewer employees don't get the benefit of the Employment Standards Code, we're now basically exempting the vast majority of agricultural workers from the Employment Standards Code.

In the past what had happened is that they had their own specific regulations, which ensured that at the very least they got paid wages and were covered by the minimum wage. When they worked an hour; they got paid an hour. Those kinds of things. But the way this is structured is that we've excluded them completely from the application of the Employment Standards Code, which means, of course, that the minister of labour, should he at some point sit down and realize that he honestly didn't mean to create a slave class in Alberta and try to pass regulations to provide some level of protection, he does not have the legislative authority to pass those regulations anymore because he has statutorily prevented himself from passing those regulations.

What we were trying to do was stop them from making this mistake. You know, we took some time, we talked to folks. We said: really, you seriously don't even want to give yourselves the opportunity to pass regulations that say, "Yeah, it's okay. You've got to work longer hours, and you don't get overtime; you don't get days off; harvest days are intense, blah, blah, blah, all those things. But we still expect that you're going to get paid." What's happened now as a result of this is: no right to get paid, nothing whatsoever.

Then I called a few lawyers, including some experts in this out in Ontario, and I said, "Well, what happens in common law in Canada? Like, if they are simply at the whim of the common law, will the common law read in the minimum wage as sort of a given that that has to be part of the contract?" And the lawyer said: well, you know, it's been a long time since this structure has been in place, so we don't really know, but the fundamentals of the common law are that there has to be demonstration of a contract having been put in place, and the contract means that both sides have to understand what they've agreed to, and in most cases it's helpful that it be in writing.

However, since a lot of these folks who are seasonal employees often come here, actually, from Mexico and other parts of Central America to work on farms – anyone who does farming knows that that's where many of these seasonal employees are coming from – they often don't speak English well enough and don't necessarily read English well enough to be able to determine whether there's an actual meeting of the minds in terms of the contract. So it is actually very possible for a person, upon discovering that they haven't been paid and that they're never going to be paid and that they had no right to be paid, if they try to sue in court, the court will say: well, did you have a written contract; did you have a common understanding? More likely than not, they'll be relying on casual verbal conversations, and they won't be able to prove their case. This, of course, assumes that you've got someone with the wherewithal to actually hire a lawyer and go to small claims court and try to make their case.

Now, of course, you would think that some things might protect those workers, like, you know, that the employer has to keep a record of the fact that they made these people work for X or Y numbers of hours a day, a week, a month. Well, nope. No, they don't. They used to have to under the Employment Standards Code, but they sure don't anymore.

Now, there used to be regulations that provided for a minimum amount of deductions from people's paycheques for room and board. Nope, those don't apply anymore.

There used to be regulations we had actually put in place after much conversation and accommodation and discussion and negotiation with a broad range of farmers. There used to be rules that said that for every 28 days a farm worker must get four days off. They could get it all together; they could get one day off a week, you know, whatever. It doesn't have to be specific. The farmer can pick and choose. They could, you know, hopefully, use that day on a bad weather day or whatever, but there had to be four days off in 28 days. That, of course, doesn't apply anymore.

In fact, what can happen now is that you can get some poor fellow coming from Mexico or some other part of Central America to a farm, have it arranged, a friend through a friend, verbally, maybe in English or maybe not, nothing in writing. They show up. They stay in the bunkhouse. We all know what bunkhouses look like. Anyone who's ever been on a farm knows about the bunkhouses. They stay in the bunkhouse. They get food provided by their boss. They work 50 consecutive 12-hour days, and at a certain point they go: hmm, 50 consecutive 12-hours days; shouldn't I get paid? Well, in the Employment Standards Code there would be a rule that says that every now and then the employer has got to pay you. That doesn't apply anymore. Anyway, they're told: sorry; no rules there.

So they worked 50 consecutive days, 12 hours a day, no day off – they have no right to that – they're likely living in some rundown, very possibly mouse-infested bunkhouse, getting food a couple of times a day. Then at the end of that – and they've worked whatever 50 times 12 is; is that over 6,000 hours? – they've worked those hours, they go to get paid, and the boss says: "Well, we would pay you, but your room and board actually costs a fair amount. We were only ever going to pay you $3 an hour because there's absolutely nothing in the law anymore to prevent us from deciding to only pay you $3 an hour." There was, but there isn't anymore thanks to this bill. That's what you're doing. Don't look at me like that because that's what this bill is doing, guys over there. That's exactly what you are doing. You have removed the right of these people to be paid a minimum wage. You have given . . .

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, it's my understanding that . . . [interjection] Through the chair, please, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Through the chair, I would suggest to anyone who is skeptical about what I'm suggesting: you should read your legislation very carefully because that's exactly what it says.

The boss says: "You can get paid $3, $4 an hour, but it turns out that your room and board costs that much. So you're not going to get the $3 an hour for the 6,000 hours you worked, but what we will do is that we'll write you a cheque for $800 because that's what's left, but we'll throw that in the mail to you. Give us your address in Mexico." You know what? There is absolutely nothing that this very vulnerable worker can do about that, and there is no place they can go to complain about that. They're not allowed to talk to employment standards officers because that's been exempted.

We have literally invited the opportunity for workers to be historically exploited just in this province. This scenario will only be legal in Alberta. It absolutely astounds me that the members opposite think that's okay. You know, literally, folks, I'm not here making this stuff up. I would rather have just said: "Oh, yeah. Okay. We got rid of Bill 6. I guess that's unfortunate. We'll talk about it a bit, and then we'll carry on because that's what they ran on, you know. What are you going to do?" But, no, we have to talk about this. It is jaw-dropping to me that folks over there would quietly look at their phones and ignore this conversation and be okay with the fact that we are constructing a legal regime within which the scenario I just described is absolutely permissible. It is shameful. Interesting.

11:00

Now, what are some of the other things that these workers have no access to? Well, as we've already talked about, it's the minimum wage. We've already talked about rest periods. Obviously, there is no access to maternity leave or parental leave, reservist leave, no compassionate care leave, no bereavement leave, no domestic violence leave, no citizenship ceremony leave – that's ironic – no critical illness of a child leave, no long-term illness or any injury leave, no personal and family responsibility leave, no death or disappearance of a child leave, also no vacation, no vacation pay. I've already talked about how they have no right to a payment of earnings and no right to have the employer keep employment records. They, of course, have no right to get notice when they are terminated. They have no right to termination pay. They have no right to have rules around what is deducted from their earnings limited. They have no right to process or file complaints. There are no rules for work for individuals under 18 years old. Yeah, those are the highlights of what we have decided that this particularly vulnerable group of workers are not entitled to be protected around. That is what we've done.

Interestingly, when I raised this in question period last week, the Premier rose and with great moral outrage suggested that I was attacking the personal integrity of every farmer in Alberta by suggesting that maybe it might be important to have rules in place that would provide for basic – basic – human rights protections for these workers. Just to be clear, the things I just outlined are identified in the UN international human rights code, that is expected of any country. Just to be clear, there will be a complaint filed against this government when this bill passes. We'll be filing it. Notwithstanding that, the Premier thought that I was being offensive and insulting to farmers by suggesting that they needed laws in place to avoid these kinds of fundamental breaches of human rights.

Now, let's just work through the logic of that little piece of brilliance, Mr. Chair. If that is the case, one would argue that anybody here that suggests we should have speed limits in school zones is attacking the fundamental integrity of every single person that drives a car, because we should know that they can be trusted to drive safely through a school zone. Or, if we were to suggest that there should be rules to prevent people from drinking and driving, well, then, we are fundamentally attacking the individual, personal integrity of every person that ever picks up a drink, myself included because, you know, I happen to like to enjoy a drink. Apparently, by suggesting that we have rules that prevent people from drinking and driving, that would be a fundamental attack on my integrity according to the incredible intellectualized logic track of the Premier. Let me suggest that the Premier maybe needs to think through his arguments a little teeny bit longer, because that is the most ridiculous argument I have ever heard.

Now, it has also been suggested in previous conversations around the minimum wage and exemptions to the minimum wage for children – that's where we decided that we would go from $15 an hour to $13.25 an hour for children who are working. The minister of labour suggested that by reducing wages by $1.75, we were going to be creating jobs for children. Now, I again take issue with that logic. I'm wondering if the thought here is that by violating international standards of basic human rights, we are hoping to create jobs for those people who are seeking jobs in the international standard of human rights exempt field, because I know that there are lots of people out there begging to get work here in Canada in a setting that violates their basic rights.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I would like to take the opportunity to recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I really appreciate the new components and arguments that have been raised by the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, who obviously has a passion for protecting workers' rights, not only a passion but a skill set. Having been a labour lawyer, I think she has much to add to this bill around its constitutionality as well as the ethics around it. I'd ask that the member continue with her analysis and proposals.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members who wish to perhaps continue? I see the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition. Thank you to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora for that intervening speaker.

Ms Notley: Yeah. Thank you, hon. member. I did have just a couple more things to say. We'll see how long. Anyway, I won't go on for too much longer. I really just do want to highlight this issue as well, about how we really are talking about vulnerable workers. There has been a long-standing tradition of temporary agricultural workers from other countries coming to Alberta for short periods of time to work on our farms and our ranches and who then go back home, and that is fine. I know of many wonderful relationships that have developed between farmers and ranchers and folks that worked for them from other countries that, you know, spanned decades as they visited back and forth and all that kind of stuff, so I know that those arrangements happen.

But, to me, the idea that we would show our face in any kind of international setting or, frankly, national setting and say, "Yes, we are a place where people can come to work and get paid $3 an hour or $1 an hour or never" and that that's okay because we think that's what's necessary for our farming community to be able to survive and that Alberta farmers are so vulnerable that they simply cannot uphold the same standards as farmers in every other part of the country – I don't know. Like, to me, that's not a selling point to the rest of the world or the rest of the country for why Alberta should be considered an economic engine of the country or anywhere else. Frankly, what we would end up being considered is an economic exploiter. Quite frankly, I think most farmers would be embarrassed that this government thinks that the only way they can survive is to break ILO, international human rights, and United Nations laws. I actually think our farmers are quite capable of competing and being successful while also paying people that they ask to work for them.

I just do want to talk a little bit, though, about this because it is not just something we're talking about for rhetorical flair or anything like that. I mean, this is a true experience. You know, way back in the day, when living in Toronto, I had the opportunity to work with a number of different groups of temporary foreign workers who were working in a number of different sectors, including in the agriculture sector in Ontario. This was back in the late '80s. The depth and breadth of the suffering that was imposed upon these people, the amount of abuse they were expected to tolerate, the challenges that their families were expected to just suffer through were things that opened my eyes in a way that they never had been before. Honestly, as a young law student in the late '80s I was shocked at the conditions and the working conditions that we would allow to exist in sweatshops in some of the poorest parts of downtown Toronto as well as in some of the farming settings outside of Toronto at that time. I became involved then and never stopped working around groups that were developed and grew out of the desire to fight for the most basic of human rights and employment rights for these vulnerable workers.

It really saddens me today that we are talking about moving forward on a bill that would give Canada such a black eye, such a step backwards, such an exploitive record. This isn't about righting the so-called imbalance between unions and employers. I mean, that's a whole other story and a whole other debate. This is not about that conversation within a window of prosperity where we disagree about who gets more and who gets less. This is about a window that is much bigger, where you have basic, fundamental rights to be paid for your work or you do not have basic, fundamental rights to be paid for your work.

I was cautioned, the last time I talked about this, about getting too hot and using inflammatory language to describe a situation where we intentionally, statutorily, institutionally, through the levers of this government, enable a situation where people will work and will have no right to be paid and will be brought to a country and then led along with promises of fairness, only to discover that they have been exploited and that they have no recourse. Here in Alberta we are going to say that that's the way things work because some people just aren't good enough to deserve a fundamental wage.

It's a very sad day that that's what this province is. No other province in the country, Mr. Chair. No other province in the country. Everywhere people deserve a basic wage for their work. Most places they deserve something called a minimum wage. Typically efforts are taken to exempt people and provide a lower minimum wage if you feel like attacking the youth, women, whatever, but never have I seen us completely eliminate the right to a minimum wage at all. Because of the structure that the drafters have adopted in writing this bill, that's exactly what this government is intentionally doing, breaching the ILO convention, setting itself up for complaints to the United Nations, fundamentally undercutting the rights of the most vulnerable Albertans and the most vulnerable people working here in this province of Alberta. Let me tell you that Alberta farmers don't need any government to do that for them. They are more than capable of doing what is right to be successful in their businesses, and it's, quite frankly, insulting to them and anyone else to think that that's what they need. It's insulting to all Albertans that we have this black mark, this legislative, statutory black mark, on our record.

The way to avoid that is to pass this amendment. Pass this amendment, include those workers, and then if you want to undercut them and exempt them from certain parts of the Employment Standards Code, write the regulation to do that and make it clear. But maintain basic rights. Maintain the right to be paid. Retain the right to be paid a minimum wage. Retain the right to collect your pay if you are not paid. These are such fundamental, basic rights. Pass this resolution, and then write a regulation to address whatever you feel you need to do. Do not vote down this amendment and block your ability to fix this problem.

I hope members opposite will consider doing something that is remotely akin to trying to protect Alberta from what will otherwise be pretty much one of the saddest days as it relates to human rights in the history of this province in about the last five or six decades.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to amendment A2? I see that the hon. Minister of Labour and Immigration has risen to speak on this matter.

Mr. Copping: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'd like to speak briefly to this amendment on behalf of my colleague Minister Dreeshen. I want to speak a little bit to a background of why we're making this change concerning the farm freedom act. You know, this is a promise that we made.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you right at the start. However, I think that it would be probably better to refer to the hon. member in question who you were referring to as the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Copping: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

The Deputy Chair: Yes. Thank you.

Mr. Copping: My apologies. Thank you for the correction.

By background, why are we making this change in the farm freedom act? Quite simply, Mr. Chair, this is a promise that we made. When the previous government passed Bill 6, it imposed additional costs, rules, and regulations on farmers – rules and regulations that they had before – and made it more difficult for them to run their operations. Further, farmers and ranchers were outraged. I understand that there were protests on the front of the Legislature, days and weeks of protests, concerns about Bill 6 imposing costs making it difficult for farmers moving forward.

Mr. Chair, you know, I'm a city boy from Calgary-Varsity, but I did grow up on a ranch outside Water Valley, Alberta. I understand ranching. You need significant flexibility because the cows don't drop the calves between 9 and 5. That happens at 3 in the morning, 4 in the morning. They need you to be able to actually do the work. This type of work also is where family members help each other, neighbours help each other, and you need flexibility to actually get the work done.

The farmers and ranchers were outraged when Bill 6 was passed. It wasn't necessary. Farmers and ranchers do not, as suggested by members opposite, exploit their workers. In fairness to the members opposite, although they made some changes, this anger remained. We heard it loud and clear prior to the election, so we made a commitment in the farm freedom act to address this issue. We made a commitment that we would repeal Bill 6, that we would require employers to maintain workplace insurance for farm workers but give them choice, either WCB or some type of private insurance, that we would ensure basic safety standards, and that we would exempt small farms from employment legislation, following the example of New Brunswick.

In addition, we made a commitment, Mr. Chair, that we would immediately launch comprehensive consultations. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry did exactly that. Over the summer he held consultations across the entire province, spoke to thousands of ranchers, farm workers, and farmers. He listened, and from that he created Bill 26 to address the issues, the additional red tape, while at the same time maintaining safety for farm workers. We lived up to those commitments, ensured basic safety standards. That's here in the bill. We reduce some of the red tape in regard to the application of the code, but the act remains, and there's a commitment to safety. We are maintaining our commitments in terms of providing choice and specifically exempting small farms from employment legislation following the New Brunswick example.

In New Brunswick, just so we're crystal clear, the legislation is very clear. It exempts all small farms and ranches from all employment standards. The members opposite suggest somehow – and they point to the minimum wage provision, for example, – that this is unconscionable, that this is done nowhere else in Canada. Mr. Chair, that is simply not the case. In Saskatchewan minimum wage doesn't apply. In Ontario minimum wage doesn't apply. Then, as we already talked about, in New Brunswick minimum wage doesn't apply.

Does that mean that farm workers there are being paid $1 an hour? No, Mr. Chair. That's simply not the case. That's not what it means. We made a commitment to farmers and ranchers that we would provide flexibility. As the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry says, "No one cares more about farm workers than farmers" and ranchers. On the small farms they're like family. They work together, ensure that they have safety. Given that that is the commitment that we made, given that that was what was demanded by farmers and ranchers, and given that they are not exploiting their workers, quite frankly, I suggest that we reject this amendment.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has risen to speak on this amendment.

Ms Notley: Just a couple of quick points. As I said before, we absolutely acknowledge that the members opposite ran on repealing

Bill 6. We are opposed to it, but we understand that's what was going to happen. The structure of this legislation does more than repeal Bill 6, as I've said.

The member opposite talked about the debacle and the misery of all the demonstrations that occurred at the end of 2015 around Bill 6. It is true. That is true. That is why we spent two years trying to respond to them as opposed to putting up signs in our window telling them that we don't care about what they have to say, as was done by this government to demonstrators, demonstrations that were 10 times the size of the demonstrations he described.

He talked about flexibility. We understand the need for flexibility. We actually adjusted things in order to put in flexibility. I was just now even talking about other ways to provide even more flexibility. Nobody is negating the issue of flexibility.

What we are debating is the issue that there is no right to a minimum wage. I have documents here that say that through other regulations every other province actually provides minimum wage. Because of the way you've structured this legislation, you don't have the regulatory authority to provide for minimum wage, so we will be the only province with no minimum wage. I don't know how many times we can describe that.

We talk about and the member opposite has talked about allowing families and neighbours to work. That would still happen. That happened under Bill 6, quite frankly, and that could still happen. This is not about that. This is about those people who are working as employees typically coming in from other countries.

Finally, the member opposite talked about how the application of the Employment Standards Code is a form of red tape that needs to be eliminated. I am sorry, Mr. Chair. The obligation to pay people a wage for work: if that's what you call red tape, then I think that most Albertans would agree that that whole ministry should be eliminated. That's not red tape. That's human rights. If that's what red tape means to you folks, then I think we need to really reconsider that whole ministry.

That is my response. I am aware of what exists, but what I am saying is that even though other jurisdictions provide great, great levels of flexibility and different sets of rules, they have given themselves the regulatory authority to ensure that minimum wage applies. This removes that regulatory authority from the government. Then it is very clear on the record that there is no minimum wage unless you fix this, which is what we are proposing. If you pass this amendment, you would still have the regulatory authority to exempt everybody exactly the way you want to but still ensure that they have to get paid a wage. It would be shocking that you wouldn't take steps to ensure that that was the case.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak to amendment A2?

Seeing none, on amendment A2 as proposed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

9 a.m.

Wednesday, December 4, 2019

Prayers

The Speaker: Hon. members, the prayer. Lord, the God of righteousness and truth, grant to our Queen and to her government, to all Members of the Legislative Assembly, and all in positions of responsibility the guidance of Your spirit. May they never lead the province wrongly through love of power, desire to please, or unworthy ideas but, laying aside all private interests and prejudices, keep in mind their responsibility to seek to improve the condition of all. Amen.

Hon. members, please be seated. We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Third Reading

Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry. Take 2.

Mr. Dreeshen: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a bit of déjà vu as I'm happy to rise in this House to move third reading of Bill 26, the Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019, as I did yesterday.

I thought it was great, Mr. Speaker, that there were more members in the House that got to debate this bill yesterday. There were some amendments, there was thoughtful debate on both sides of the House, but it's great to see that our rural caucus really had a lot of involvement in the developing and drafting of this bill.

As I've said numerous times, Mr. Speaker, there were 25 consultations that happened across the province this summer, and it was great to see, you know, farmers and farm workers from every type and size of farm and commodity of farm. They all came together, and there were four major common themes that I think are throughout Bill 26. Those themes are changes to employment standards, labour relations, OH and S, and insurance. If I can just go a little bit into each one of those here and, again, into the rationale of why there was such a consensus in the farming community behind each one.

When it comes to employment standards, Mr. Speaker, that was probably one of the fastest conversations that happened, where every different farmer and farm worker just has that understanding, the realization that farming is unique, that there are peak times of the year in which you have to do whatever it takes to get it done. You're not just fighting against the clock. You're fighting against Mother Nature and conditions that are outside of your control. The old saying that you make hay when the sun shines pretty much encapsulates perfectly why there have to be exemptions from employment standards for farms here in Alberta, as there are in other jurisdictions, in other provinces across Canada. Again, it's just that understanding of the reality of farming.

There were members opposite that talked about their times helping out in calving or harvest season and during harvests. I mean, it was nice to see that there was at least an understanding that, again, farming is unique.

When it came to labour relations, Mr. Speaker, something that we heard from the farming community is that there has been no certification of unions. Again, there was a concern that because of the sensitivity of the type of work in agriculture, you could have negative effects on farms if there was a strike. Something that farmers would say is that there's no need for unions on farms because, again, there are such amazing relationships between farmers and farm workers. They're sitting there at the dinner tables with farmers and farm workers together, and that close camaraderie between farm workers and farmers is just a reality of what happens out in Alberta.

The Occupational Health and Safety Act, that overarching piece of legislation, is going to be there, but it won't be prescriptive by the specific OH and S code. Again, that was something that farmers said was ridiculous, that the previous government, with Bill 6, tried to have specific OH and S codes that each individual farm would have to try to adhere to, which, again, was impractical and something that was never developed. Someone said that, you know, if you could just legislate common sense, I think you'd find the right balance, and I think this overarching OH and S Act will achieve that.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the biggest part of the consultations that we had, that took up the most amount of time, was on insurance. This bill will have choice in insurance of WCB or private insurance. It's something that I thank the minister of labour for, his work specifically on this as well, talking to insurance industries to say: "Look at a crossjurisdictional scan again of what's offered in the United States and in other provinces and in other countries. How can we actually get a comparator to WCB? It doesn't have to be the same, it doesn't have to be an apple-to-apple comparison of WCB worker insurance as a private insurance option, but what are the benefits of private worker insurance, and what are the benefits of WCB?" I think that this choice ultimately gives that flexibility to farmers and farm workers, whether it be copay, whether it be certain levels of coverage, whether it's on a work site or off a work site. That flexibility is going to be there for farmers and farm workers, and I think that that insurance piece is something that, again, has been very appreciated by the ag community.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there have been lots of articles on this already, kind of an initial response from the ag community. I'd just like to read a couple of quotes from an article – I think it was from yesterday – in the Alberta Farmer Express, Alberta's New Farm Safety Act Gets Warm Response. This was from John Guelly, the Alberta Canola chair:

It's making farming easier . . . Everybody was scared to go across the road . . .

We can [now] think about expanding again without a whole bunch of hoops.

That is, again, farmers on the ground saying that the changes to Bill 6, to now have this Bill 26, are actually making farming easier. But also there is a willingness to expand. There's optimism in the agriculture community such that farmers are now willing to expand their operations and to invest more back into their farms.

Also in this article Kevin Bender, a regional rep for Alberta Wheat, said:

It will lower stress levels and give more freedom . . .

For our sake, we didn't want to hire people because we had all this red tape to deal with.

Again, it's just an understanding that what we're trying to achieve here is to unlock the economic potential of our agriculture sector, and I think we've come to a really good balance.

In third reading now I would like to thank all the members of this House for their time and their study and everything that they've contributed to this debate and the drafting of this bill and the consultations. I think about half of our government caucus were actually at these consultations over the summer, and I'm just very grateful for all of the team effort that went into the drafting of Bill 26. I'm happy to see how the vote turns out, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you very much.

Statement by the Speaker

Speakers List Following Bill Recommittal to Committee of the Whole

The Speaker: Hon. members, by way of providing context with respect to third reading, as this is the first time in the 30th Legislative Assembly that a recommittal motion has taken place and third reading has been moved again, the speakers list has been reset. It is as though the previous third reading has not yet taken place, so any member of the Assembly is able to speak to third reading regardless of whether or not they had spoken previously to third reading, just by way of context for you.

The other comment that I have for the hon. minister is that he quoted at some length from an article. It would be reasonable and expected of him to table it in the Assembly later today.

I saw the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung would like to provide comment.

Mr. Dach: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. While I rise today, I regret to inform the House that I don't share the minister's enthusiasm for passage of this piece of legislation.

Bill 26 is a backwards step in many ways, and I know that the minister is proud to bring forward this legislation, seeing that he's ticked off a lot of boxes, as far as he believes the farming community is concerned, with respect to eliminating what we had brought forward when we were in government, our Bill 6. Of course, this not only repeals Bill 6, Mr. Speaker; it goes a long way beyond that. It implements some very damaging and awkward elements in this legislation.

I know the minister just mentioned a moment ago that he felt that the new Bill 26 eliminated a lot of red tape. Well, Mr. Speaker, what he refers to as red tape are actually international labour standards and standards of law that are enshrined not only in national constitutions such as our own but also in the universal declaration of human rights. For example, the legislative norms that you find in most western democracies are that the right to organize is enshrined and respected in legislation and in constitutions. Yet this piece of legislation removes that right for farm workers and small farms, those with five or under employees.

While indeed the family farm in the agricultural sector, where producers are growing crops and raising animals, is certainly a very unique place in the category of workplaces, it is still a workplace, Mr. Speaker, and, as such, workers who are on those farms deserve the same protection as anybody else with respect to the right to organize. While the minister is correct in saying that that right has not been exercised often, his estimation that it's not therefore necessary because there's such a collegial and respectful relationship between farm workers and their employers on these small farms – that's no argument and no justification for removing such a basic fundamental right, to organize, if indeed farm workers feel the need to come together.

As I've mentioned before in this House, we are at the 100-year anniversary of the Winnipeg General Strike of 1919, where Canadians lost their lives trying to establish the right to organize in Winnipeg after the return of soldiers from the First World War. This celebration of the 100-year anniversary of that is certainly an interesting background to what we see happening in Alberta right now, where the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry is happily removing the right to organize from a class of workers, from farm workers on small farms, and suggesting that it's simply something that isn't necessary, that they're not using it and therefore they won't miss it.

Well, it begs the question, Mr. Speaker: who's next? And what's next? What category, what class of workers will this government go after next when they decide that perhaps a piece of labour legislation shouldn't apply in a particular category? Just simply saying that there's no need for this legislation because it hasn't been exercised and because there's a special relationship on the farm between farm workers and their bosses, their employers, isn't a justification for taking such a drastic step to actually remove the right to organize in a workplace. I think it's something that people across the country and, in fact, internationally will look at, shake their heads, and wonder: in a western democracy what level of labour rights will we sink below if indeed the government continues on this path to eliminating the long-standing norms of fundamental rights in labour legislation?

We fail to recognize as often or as well as we should, Mr. Speaker, in this Legislature the fundamental necessity of having a healthy labour movement and healthy labour legislation which allows and respects the right of workers to organize and form a union and represent themselves in negotiations. That pillar, as we look at pillars in this Legislature holding this building up, these columns – one of those fundamental columns happens to be that right to organize, the right to associate, the right to form a union and to represent oneself in labour negotiations as an organized labour force. Without that, if indeed we keep chipping away at it, as this government seems intent to do, we end up with less of a real democracy. That is more than shameful. It's something that Albertans should recognize and raise their voices against, as organized labour certainly is doing right now.

I know that people in this province who are working people, who were perhaps involved already in the labour movement and maybe even with organized labour, are appalled at what's happening, particularly with this measure. According to the AFL president, Gil McGowan, speaking about the UCP farm workers bill:

Bill 26 is a giant step backwards for farm, ranch and agriculture workers . . . back to no longer having the basic workplace rights enjoyed by their counterparts in every other Canadian province. In fact, this bill goes beyond repealing the workplace protections put in place under the previous government. It takes Alberta even further backwards by adding more exempted workers in new industries such as greenhouses and mushroom farms, which were previously covered by workplace legislation even before Bill 6.

Mr. Speaker, I will table the statement from Mr. McGowan that I'm quoting from now later on in the House.

He goes on to say that the minister responsible for this bill "should be singled out for particular criticism." I agree with that. It's not something that one should be enthusiastically cheering about, as Mr. McGowan says, "stripping rights and protections from some of our most vulnerable and long-suffering fellow citizens," farm workers, protections that internationally are respected under covenants such as the universal declaration of human rights as well as the Constitution of this country.

Mr. Speaker, of course, it's very evident that this minister is no friend of ordinary working Albertans. He's really got his sights set on attacking organized labour, and this is one small way that they can put a stick in the spokes of the ability of organized labour to continue their internationally respected rights to actually organize and form a union. I think it's a bit of a trial balloon, and we'll see how far they intend to take it. There will be other elements in other pieces of legislation where this government will try to test the will of Albertans again to allow them to diminish the rights of workers to exercise their long-standing rights to organize, and we will be ever vigilant on that front.

Now, I'll go on to say also that beyond reversing hundreds of years of basic labour and human rights by removing core protections for workers – we know that the majority of farmers, of course, care for their workers and pay more than the law allows, but not everyone. Something that I have yet to hear a good explanation for from this minister or this government, Mr. Speaker, is why it's okay for some workers to be paid as little as $2 or $3 an hour or perhaps nothing at all because the minimum wage requirement is gone from this legislation. If indeed it's gone for paid farm workers, the right to expect to actually be paid, if that's completely exempted, what is next? What piece of legislation will this type of draconian measure be inserted into next?

Once again, we have the explanation from the minister and members of the government saying: "Well, gosh. You know, farmers have a great relationship with their employees. They will work out the payment arrangements. There's no need for minimum wage requirements. That's just onerous red tape." Well, I'll tell you what. These are fundamental rights that are established internationally. On our globe, anywhere on the planet, workers should have the right enshrined in law that they will be paid for their work. As our Leader of the Official Opposition yesterday noted, it may be something that can be negotiated, the actual minimum wage that somebody is paid, but the actual right to earn a minimum wage is fundamentally nonnegotiable. Yet this government seems to think not and has implemented in part of this legislation a measure to eliminate the need to actually have a basic minimum wage. So it goes on. It's fundamentally a gleeful attack upon workers and their rights.

In Bill 6, that we had brought in, it originally exempted family members from the applications of employment standards, and that's well expanded on in Bill 26. The expanded clause on pages 5 and 6 of the bill adds:

- (b) employees who are employed in a farming or ranching operation referred to in subsection (4), or to their employer while acting in the capacity of employer of those employees, if the operation employs 5 or fewer employees.

So, indeed, what we'd end up having is an exemption of a class of workers, unlike any jurisdiction in North America, from earning at least some type of basic minimum wage for their work. It's more than undoing Bill 6, Mr. Speaker. It's taking Alberta into pre Industrial Revolution labour law territory.

We'll continue to monitor the situation as the government moves forward with legislation in other areas. However, I think Albertans are rightly forewarned that the attack will continue and that labour legislation will be something this government will continue to chip away at so that the rights of workers that are enshrined in international law are diminished under their watch.

We understand, of course, that this was a key campaign promise of the UCP, but it goes way too far, Mr. Speaker. Our farm and ranch workers deserve to be protected by modern workplace health and safety rules. It's important to get occupational health and safety right because, of course, lives are at stake.

Here again the government is picking the pockets of workers for their overtime as well. So not only will these hard-working workers now have to deal with the fallout; the government has increased their cost of living to pay for its $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate giveaway.

Now, if the government is truly sincere, Mr. Speaker, about supporting farmers, it should take action about the many farmers that are impacted by poor harvests and are struggling. They told the government that they need action and that the current framework does not work for them, but they're not getting anything.

The government estimates that about three-quarters of Alberta's farms will be classified as small operations. So three-quarters of Alberta's farms will now become workplaces with no protection for workers as far as their right to organize.

When it comes to the choice amongst insurance options, WCB versus private insurance to cover paid workers on the farms, the repeal of Bill 6 once again shows that the government has a poor lack of judgment in making the decision to get rid of the requirement to have WCB. For example, in 2016 there were 777 WCB claims in the agriculture industry, 794 in 2017, 886 in 2018, and 572 in the first eight months of 2019, therefore showing that indeed the WCB was a viable product, a worthwhile insurance option, and one that farm workers were exercising their right to use. It was working. Yet this government sees fit to once again mute the needs of paid farm workers by directing that secondary option, private insurance to be offered alongside of WCB. It's something that paid farm workers will be lessened in their benefits from.

The paid farm workers who indeed are injured on farms can now sue their employers, which is different from what would have happened under our Bill 6, where WCB was in place. It protected the employer, actually, from further litigation in the event of a WCB claim being made. This is something that I think the minister has failed to really emphasize in his proud plunge to make WCB an option and in his desire to promote the option for private insurance.

I'm not sure how many lawsuits a small farmer could sustain if indeed an injured worker, an injured employee from that person's farm decided that the compensation from a private insurance claim was insufficient to compensate him or his family for the damages suffered by an injury or death on the farm, but this type of civil litigation for injuries can run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. I would venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that one lawsuit from an injured worker on a farm could potentially sink a family farm. That's the type of exposure that this minister has opened up with the option to continue with private insurance versus the WCB. We will certainly be monitoring that and finding out over time how many farms actually go bankrupt and have to foreclose because they suffer a lawsuit against them which they don't have the means to pay.

Overall, Mr. Speaker, the right to exercise the option to organize as farm workers; the occupational health and safety standards, which will not necessarily be enforced on these small farms, the fact that you won't have the database to determine best practices because of OH and S being not as widely implemented under this legislation; the labour relations situation where you don't have a basic minimum wage necessity enshrined in legislation, where there's no need for an employer to respect the right of the workers on family farms to organize; the option to opt for private insurance and therefore loss of the OH and S data and the exposure that a family farm operator will suffer as a result of insurance claims and lawsuits that will result: this certainly isn't something that I think all Alberta workers look forward to.

For those in the workplace throughout the province who are witnessing what's going on right now with the family farm and the government's attack on labour legislation therein under the guise of red tape when in fact what they're looking at doing is chipping away at international labour standards under the code word "flexibility," which is code for opting out of universally recognized legislated labour law norms, these are all major steps backwards, Mr. Speaker, for this province to take in terms of labour legislation.

I think that internationally we'll see that we have a pretty big black eye as a result of this. People who regarded Canada as a place where workers' rights were fundamentally protected and enshrined are wondering how far backwards we're going to go and how far backwards – other countries who think that they will also want to perhaps chip away at workers' rights will now feel that they have the pathway to go. I really need to say that this legislation is a disaster.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are on third reading of Bill 26, the Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019. I see the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon has risen.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to be able to rise today and to speak in favour of Bill 26, the Farm Freedom and Safety Act, 2019. I want to start by saying thank you. I want to say thank you to the hon. minister that has brought forward this bill. It is true that we had 25 consultation sessions across this province, and it was a pleasure to have the minister in my constituency to meet with the good citizens of Drayton Valley-Devon. I can tell you that they were grateful. They were very grateful to this minister for taking the time to come, for asking, for listening, for committing to reflect their concerns on this bill. They had grave concerns with Bill 6, that was passed by the previous government. I had farmers in my constituency literally in tears of frustration over Bill 6. So to have a minister that would visit our constituency, that would listen to the concerns of the farmers in my constituency, and that would enact this piece of legislation – they're very grateful, and on behalf of my constituents I want to say thank you for this bill.

This bill addresses in a very common-sense way the concerns that my constituents brought up. You know, they kept telling me, as we went through the original Bill 6 debate, that farming is different, that farming is not like most other businesses in this province. We even call it the family farm, because one of the realities of farming in Alberta is that many of these farms are run by families. They live on them; they work on them. Everything about their life is surrounding this farm. It's a family farm. To apply the labour code and all of the rules and regulations that were under Bill 6 to the family farm just made no sense, in their minds, so it's good to see that in this bill we've recognized that.

Small farms, with under five employees who work less than six months consecutively, will be exempt from all employment standards and workplace insurance. It recognizes the reality that small farms will often hire on a very casual basis. It might be for calving season. It might be over harvest. You know, this kind of work just doesn't apply to the employment standards and the issues for workplace insurance, et cetera. Farms that are larger, that have a significant number of wage workers: they're required to follow occupational health and safety. They're required to have workplace insurance and to meet employment standards. This makes sense.

There is so much common sense in this bill. I know that my farmers in my constituency are appreciative of the common sense that you've brought into their work environment.

We now have the capacity for farm workers to be able to purchase their own disability and life insurance, and often that means that they can be covered for hours after they're working, so off the clock. This allows them to have the choice of whether they'll be covered by WCB or by some form of private insurance. We do expect our farms in this province, our great farms in this province, to follow and to maintain basic safety standards while being exempt from the application of the OH and S regulations and codes. Anybody that has been in a farm environment understands just how difficult it would be to apply those standards that might be fine on a factory floor to a family farm.

Now, the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung spent a great deal of time, prior to me, talking about Bill 26 and spent a lot of time talking about a very typical view from the other side of the House, that sees the world almost exclusively in a class structure. Now, let me start by saying that I believe that every Member of this Legislative Assembly supports the idea of having a healthy labour movement. It's part of the modern civil society that we live in. Everyone in this House, I believe, will and does support the concept of labour rights and the ability to organize. But I think we have to be very careful. Not everything in life falls into that rigid structure of class warfare. Not everything in life can be governed by and overseen by a labour movement mentality. I think that we heard clearly in this province that as far as farmers and ranchers and farm families in this province, they don't fit into that rigid world view.

I think we have to be very careful when we stand up in this House and we laud the 100th anniversary of something like the Winnipeg General Strike. I think we have to be very careful. General strikes are known to be disruptive: disruptive to the economy, disruptive politically, disruptive to a society. To laud that period of time in 1917 and the Winnipeg General Strike, especially after we heard over this last weekend of members of the opposition supporting, as they should and as they have every right to and as we would all support with a healthy labour movement, the ability to picket, when we start to hear people, either inside or outside of this Chamber, supporting the concept of a general strike, I would be very, very, very careful.

I would be interested to hear if the members on the opposite side would be willing to clearly stand up and deny their support for the concept of a general strike. I would be very interested to hear if they would be willing to couch some of their rhetoric and put some parameters on their rhetoric. To worry more about what other countries are thinking about how we legislate in this province than listening to the people of this province and generating legislation that works for the people of this province – rather than trying to force them into the straitjacket of class warfare philosophy, I would suggest that perhaps somebody has to reconsider what they believe would be best for the people of Alberta.

I'm very happy to be able to stand up and support Bill 26. I'm very happy to see that we have brought some common sense, that they asked for, back into this community, that some farms and ranches will be exempt from the Labour Relations Code, that therefore farm workers will not have to face this issue of unionization, that no government official will randomly inspect a farm or a ranch, that OH and S will visit a farm should there be an incident that needs to be investigated that involves a waged, nonfamily worker. Common sense.

I think that's the one thing that I would stress today, that I believe that the farm families across this province, especially in my constituency of Drayton Valley-Devon, wanted to say thank you. They truly appreciated the capacity to be involved in the consultations that went on across this province. They have seen the results of this bill, and they're happy with the results of this bill. They believe that they've been listened to. It gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to say with regard to Bill 26: promise made, promise kept.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has risen.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to comment on one of the things that the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon said. I can't remember clearly if in his past life he was a social studies teacher or not. I'm not getting any response from the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon as to whether he was a social studies teacher or not. Yes, he was. So it makes it even more egregious, then, that he would refer to the Winnipeg General Strike as happening in 1917. As a social studies teacher, of course, he should know that the Winnipeg General Strike happened in 1919. I hope that, you know, he sends out a corrected message to all of his former students who he may have misled in his career as a social studies teacher in leading them to believe that the Winnipeg General Strike was in 1917.

The Speaker: I also look forward to additional grammar corrections if you want to provide them.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Yes. I would thank the hon. member for helping me to get the date appropriate. As far as making mistakes as far as numbers are concerned, I guess we must all be happy that on this side of the House we're not making the same mistakes that the opposition made when we can look back and see that we have a $63 billion debt.

The Speaker: Are there any others wishing to join in the debate under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour to rise today and bring forward a few of my thoughts on Bill 26 and, more importantly, my concerns with it. Of course, we've seen this government rush to move forward with this legislation. They campaigned on some form of what Bill 26 is, though they weren't very specific during the election what that would look like, and now we see that. Really, despite the name, Farm Freedom and Safety Act, there is nothing within this legislation that will actually increase safety on the farms across our province, so I'm not sure why they decided to put that in the text. Nevertheless, here we are.

Bill 26, of course, will repeal some or most of what was put forward in Bill 6. No more right to unionize, as we've heard from both sides of the House. We in the NDP caucus, of course, are not supporting the fact that this minister is trying to take away the rights of workers that are protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I suppose that is what I would mainly like to focus on for a moment, recognizing that in provision 2(d) everyone has the following fundamental freedoms, among them being the freedom of association.

In this legislation and as we've seen from this government through a lot of their legislation, they do not respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They do not respect rulings that have been upheld by the Supreme Court. We saw that in Bill 9, when they forced public-sector unions to wait on negotiations that were moving forward. Of course, after that, now we have the government calling for a 5 per cent rollback of these wages, negotiating in bad faith despite what the labour minister, the agriculture minister, and everyone else on the front bench seems to think.

In that provision it expresses that freedom of association protects three classes of activities: (1) the "constitutive" right to join with others and form associations, which we're seeing attacked in this legislation,

(2) the "derivative" right to join with others in the pursuit of other constitutional rights; and (3) the "purposive" right to join with others to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of other groups or entities.

Mr. Speaker, we see similar provisions throughout other pieces of Canadian legislation and laws that are binding: article 1(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights; article 22 of the international covenant on civil and political rights; article 8 of the international covenant on economic, social, and cultural rights; articles 1 to 11 of the International Labour Organization's convention 98. I could go on and on, but the fact is that this government is attacking the rights and freedoms that we as a country and as a province have protected through legislation, and rightfully so. Unfortunately, this government, I imagine because so many lawyers have donated to their party, needs to create jobs for these lawyers, and here we are.

Mr. McIver: No lawyer left behind.

Mr. Carson: No lawyer left behind, indeed, Mr. Speaker, as the member of the UCP caucus just brought forward. That does seem to be the real motto of this government. While they campaigned on jobs, pipelines, and freedom or whatever it may have been, really, what we're seeing is that getting lawyers jobs is their main goal. We see that once again in this legislation.

Of course, as has been laid out by our NDP caucus, we see the weakening of rules around overtime and overtime pay in this legislation, rolling back, once again, the protections that give workers the right to receive extra compensation after working in excess of eight hours in a day or 44 hours in a week. Unfortunately, this government doesn't believe that workers, whether they're farm workers or in any other industry, deserve to be paid fairly, and we see that in other pieces of legislation as well.

We also see that this government is exempting farm workers from employment standards regulations, Mr. Speaker, protections that are in place to ensure that the workers across this province, no matter what industry, are protected from unsafe working conditions. The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon pointed out the fact that farmers and ranchers work in an industry that is quite different from any other industry across this province, and I agree. The fact is that as hard as farm owners try, there are always going to be dangers on these sites, and we need to ensure to the best of our abilities that we are protecting those farm workers. Unfortunately, what we're seeing is an erosion of those protections through this legislation, which is very concerning.

The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon also pointed out, not to hang onto it too long – I don't intend to agree with anything that member says. He pointed out that the general strike that was being discussed earlier was disruptive, but the fact is that the protections that those workers were looking for through that general strike and the lack of protections was also disruptive, Mr. Speaker.

Now, once again this government – well, that member was saying that we essentially should be ashamed that we would say we would support workers that are trying to collectively get the safety standards that they should be afforded. Well, Mr. Speaker, at the same time this government just within the last couple of weeks was calling on the federal government to enforce antiworker back-to-work legislation. So here we have a member of the UCP caucus telling us that we should be ashamed while they once again are trying to push forward with things that are unconstitutional, Mr. Speaker.

Once again, we see a rollback of insurance in WCB coverage, and we had brought forward an amendment, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that would ensure that if a farm was to decide against WCB coverage and move to a private insurance – which in my opinion is fine as long as we're ensuring that the equal protections are there from what they were currently receiving from WCB. Unfortunately, this government did not feel it necessary to ensure that proper levels of insurance are in place on these farms, which is also concerning.

Now, overall, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this legislation not only rolls us back to just prior to Bill 6, but it rolls us back way further than that even. It is Wednesday; this government seems to think it's way-back Wednesday, back in the 1800s, early 1900s. That seems to be, unfortunately, where they're coming from with all of their bills, and we will continue to see the erosion of the ability of workers to protect their own interests under this government, to collectively engage in negotiations, as we've seen the erosion of that ability, which is extremely unfortunate, and I can imagine that we will see court challenges from this legislation. Once again we will see lawyers making their money and everyone else losing out.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I cannot bring myself to support this legislation. I think it should go back to the drawing board, which is why I also supported an amendment we had brought forward to send this back to committee, which is really where it should go.

The fact is, as was pointed out by Gil McGowan, the AFL president, on the introduction of this legislation – now, I will say that I don't agree with everything Gil says, but in this instance where he says that "Albertans will no longer be able to track farm and ranch injury rates for the province. Boy, oh boy, Mr. Speaker, that sounds like a number that we should probably keep an eye on, yet here we are with this government no longer thinking that's important.

We saw this happening before the introduction of Bill 6. We swiftly made changes to that while also increasing the number of occupational health and safety officers across our province to ensure that investigations were happening and that safety was, in fact, in place. Unfortunately, once again from this government we see across-the-board cuts, which I imagine will affect those occupational health and safety workers, that traditionally are doing this work, which once again leaves these communities less protected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, once again I will point out the fact that I understand this government committed to this in their platform. Unfortunately, I think they have just gone way too far with this piece of legislation. I will also point out the fact that I understand that farmers and ranchers in our province work in exceptionally unique conditions, that they do know their workers the best, that they every day work hard to ensure that those workers are protected to the best of their abilities, and that they have strong relationships. There's no doubt about that, but the fact is that we as a government need to do our best to ensure that the legislation and the regulations in place are protecting every worker no matter what industry they work in.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I guess I'm finding it quite strange here listening to the members opposite talk about Bill 26. When I listened to the member opposite talk about us rushing Bill 26 through – obviously, the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry spent the summer, in fact since we were elected and since he was chosen as the minister, travelling across Alberta having open town halls in I don't know how many communities, probably about 25 different communities, asking farmers specifically what they would like to see as we repealed the failed Bill 6 that the previous government put forward. Now, I know that the members opposite, when they put through Bill 6, never had near, not even a fraction, the consultation that we've had with this minister with Bill 26, so the suggestion that this was rushed through – in fact, I believe we actually brought it . . .

Mr. McIver: Two whacks at Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Loewen: Yeah. We brought it back to Committee of the Whole for them so that they could have further discussion and bring forward further amendments on this bill, so the suggestion that we were rushing through is just absolutely bizarre. Now, it seems like every time somebody gets up there and speaks on that side, all they can talk about is unions. In fact, they're even quoting their lead researcher, Gil McGowan, on what he said about this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we know what farmers felt about Bill 6. Bill 6 was deeply resented by the farming community across Alberta. There were rallies on the steps of the Legislature with Bill 6. The farmers spoke loud and clear, and they spoke loud and clear on election day when the members opposite never had one representative elected from rural Alberta. You know, they talk about things being quite different on the farm. The member opposite acknowledged that, and he's exactly right. Things are quite different on a family farm, and that's why we want to represent that in Bill 26. The members opposite, if we would look at what they brought forward when they first brought forward Bill 6 in the discussions – obviously, they had to back down on some of it. I'll tell you what: the agriculture industry still rejected it flat out.

It's interesting that the members opposite feel like they want to double down at this time when the agriculture industry spoke so loudly and clearly. I don't understand why they keep getting up and talking about and supporting their previous Bill 6, trying to talk against Bill 26 that honestly had a hundred times more consultation than Bill 6 did. I don't even know which agriculture sector or which farmer the NDP talked to when they brought in Bill 6, but I'll tell you that it couldn't have been anybody that I've been in association with, anyway, since I've been elected.

Mr. Speaker, you know, we keep hearing this over and over again from the other side, talking about Bill 26 and trying to disparage it. I think they're desperate. They're desperate to try to find something that they can disparage about Bill 26, but Bill 26 was consulted on with the agriculture industry. The minister travelled across Alberta and talked to farmers and asked what they wanted to see in this bill. Those are the facts, and obviously it's dramatically different from what those members on the other side did with Bill 6 when they were in government, when they brought that forward. In fact, that was probably the number one thing, that the consultation on it did not exist. In Bill 26, the consultation was there in 25 communities as the minister travelled around through the summer talking to farmers.

Again, it just seems like the members opposite want to double down on something that was an abject failure. At that point when they brought forward Bill 6, the trust was lost with the agriculture community. Here they keep furthering that mistrust with the NDP. I guess at one time I'll try to figure out why they keep going down this same path of failure.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are back on Bill 26. Are there others wishing to join in the debate?

The hon. the Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate you recognizing me this morning here to add my comments to Bill 26. Of course, this is only my second opportunity, but it will be my final opportunity to add some comments to a piece of legislation that I think is just looking for litigation.

I guess probably the easiest thing to say is that I don't have to work very hard, Mr. Speaker, to find something to criticize about this bill. It's actually quite effortless to do that. As I've said before on other debates, coming from labour, I also focus in on the language. What does the language mean? What does it imply? How does it affect people? That's what I like to focus in on when we're looking at pieces of legislation like this.

I'd given a little bit of, for lack of a better word, a shout-out to the Minister of Transportation in the earlier discussions. Like he had said before, I get it. The UCP won a majority government. They have the ability to change things that they see fit to change. That's their right. But I don't think they campaigned – unless somebody would like to point me to the direction in whichever copy of their election platform that it says that they were going to roll back basic human rights a hundred years by withdrawing pretty much the definition of employee that's contained on page 7 of Bill 26. I read it out earlier; I won't do that again. Everybody has the ability to look at this. It very much changes how an employee is described. It removes that, and that very clearly is a violation of human rights. You will most likely have litigation formed in this. However, we do see a pattern where this is something the government seems to relish, getting a chance to litigate in all kinds of different directions.

When you remove a person's ability just even simply to be called an employee, that opens up a potential for things to go sideways. As I'd mentioned earlier, I don't think there would be a single member in this House that would disagree with me when I say this. I think some of the farmers that we have here in the province are the best on the continent, bar absolutely none. But all it takes is one bad actor. You've seen those investigative reports where they rigged up a fridge and they called in a bunch of repairmen, and there's always one that just tries to push it too far and take advantage of somebody. I've seen it in my experience in the labour movement, where there are some fantastic employers.

I've always given a shout-out to Costco. They pay their workers well, they treat them with dignity and respect, they give them some benefits, and the working atmosphere is safe. And surprise, surprise: you're not able to unionize them.

In situations where you don't have an employer that treats people with dignity and respect, that doesn't provide a safe working environment, that doesn't pay them well, that doesn't give them any benefits, don't be surprised when they want to look for somebody to represent them.

So this bill, Bill 26, Madam Speaker, will set up those conditions to be possible, just like some of the conditions that are being set around insurance, okay? I had mentioned this earlier in debate, where there was a situation where a farm worker unfortunately had passed away on the job site, and she had to fight in court for six years and did eventually gain a judgment in her favour. What was the consequence? Obviously, six years of litigation, all the money that was being spent on that, and – how about that? – because of the judgment, it killed that farm. That farm had to shut down.

All it takes is one, one time when we have to pause and say: maybe we should address that. Usually what happens when we bring forward legislation, Madam Speaker, is that we are looking for those times, those one-offs – unfortunately, there's more than one-offs usually – where legislation has to prevent that from happening.

When you remove the language around somebody even being able to be called an employee, are they going to get at least minimum wage in this province, or are they going to be paid under it? I don't know. All it's going to take is one, at which point – you know, I think I heard one member state that they're expected to follow the occupational health and safety rules. That doesn't mean that they will. Most will, and they'll do it happily. But all it takes is one, that one instance where a worker gets severely injured or possibly even loses their life. Is that when we're willing to stand in front of those family members and say: "Well, you know, there was an expectation for that to happen. We don't know why it did. It shouldn't have. The rules were right there." So it's language like this that's contained in Bill 26 that I get very much hung up over. It's very, very difficult for me to be able to support that kind of language.

Like I said, I get it. You want to repeal what was Bill 6. I get it. You won the majority government. I don't think you ran on a mandate to turn things back a hundred years. I would argue that you don't have that. To put Albertans at risk or, even worse, temporary foreign workers that are brought in – like I said, I've seen farmers. My cousin has a cherry farm in B.C. and has gone to the ends of the Earth to support her employees, but I can't say for certain that a hundred per cent of people will do that. We've seen it. Like I said, those little investigator reports are really interesting, watching those things where they set up a situation to see how many will actually be honest about it. There's always one, but it's that one time that will come back to bite us on this legislation. It will force the government to have to stand in front of that family and say: yeah; sorry; we messed that up.

I hope that as we move forward on this bill – and I know it will get passed. If something should go wrong, I'm hoping that this government and this minister will stand up, take responsibility, and own the situation that you've now potentially created.

Thanks, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available. I see the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd just like to comment in response to that member and some previous speakers from the opposition. Again, the mindset of the NDP that somehow farmers are out to exploit their workers and that there's a violation of human rights happening down on the farm, that is so far from reality. It's very frustrating. I know that on our consultation tour that frustration was also shared by farmers. They always felt that they were being attacked by the members opposite.

I mean, Madam Speaker, when you look at the people who profit from a labour movement, when you look at people that profit from creating an artificial fear narrative between job creators and the people that actually work for them, it's interesting to see members opposite. He proudly always says that he comes from labour. That socialist class warfare, that narrative that always has to be promoted by people in that space, is alarming, I think. Their quasi arm's-length NDP researcher, Gil McGowan, even wrote an article about me, calling me a "proto-authoritarian servant of employers." If that's socialist speak for supporting job creators in the province of Alberta, I guess I'll proudly wear that label from the NDP researcher, Gil McGowan, from AFL.

Also, there was a history lesson. I know I shouldn't go down a path, Madam Speaker, to follow the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. He was very quick to criticize a member on our side that was off by two years on a date. I'm not a social studies teacher, and my history is a bit hazy. They've said numerous times in this House that this bill goes back to pre-Industrial Revolution. It's my understanding that that's, you know, Britain 18th century . . .

Mr. Smith: In 1750.

Mr. Dreeshen: . . . 1750, not Alberta 2014. Again, they're off by a couple of hundred years, 200-plus years. I mean prior to Bill 6 when I say that this bill brings us back. I'd hate to see any of those members back anything up on a farm because I'm pretty sure they'd run over whatever they were trying to back up to.

Also, when it comes to temporary foreign workers, that's a completely separate issue. This bill won't address that. They're under their own special federal rules. Madam Speaker, again this goes to, you know, the radical activists that members opposite seem to be able to promote, radical activists that came on Alberta farms. There's this push against farmers and the way that they do business. We on this side are proud of our farmers. Whether they're a dogsled operation out near Canmore or a turkey farm in southern Alberta, we're proud of the hard-working farmers that we have here in the province of Alberta. We'll always stand and promote and do everything we can to protect them from radical activists, that have these radical ideas that you keep hearing from members opposite as well as from radical groups across the province.

Ultimately, it's something that other provinces are following suit on. Ontario actually introduced stronger legislation on protecting its farmers as well, and other provinces are looking at taking examples from Alberta. It is great to see that we are leaders here in Alberta and that other provinces are following our example in protecting farmers and also farm workers.

One of the greatest parts of Bill 26, that I think is overlooked by the members opposite, is the increase of investment in the agriculture space. We've seen – I think it was a couple of months ago, actually, in your riding or just north of your riding, I believe, Madam Speaker – a $20 million investment in a new farming operation just north of Calgary. The CEO was very quick to say that with coming changes to Bill 6, that was the confidence that they had to invest here in the province of Alberta and create more jobs for Calgary and region. It is something that I think was overlooked in this previous debate, how these changes are actually attracting investment, attracting great jobs here in the province of Alberta.

Again, as many of my colleagues have said, this bill was in development a long time and has the support of the agriculture community. Thank you.

10:10

The Deputy Speaker: That mushroom farm is indeed just north of Airdrie and in the wonderful constituency that I represent.

The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I've been feverishly taking down some notes here just to try to address a few of the things that have come up. I do thank the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry for bringing Bill 26 forward. That was one of our campaign promises, and I think he's done a terrific job here.

You know, the last speaker from the opposition was talking about litigation and this being ripe for litigation. Well, last night the Leader of the Opposition stated in this place that she's going to lead that litigation, so I guess it's not surprising that they know that litigation is going to be coming forward. I think that that doesn't serve a good purpose since the people and farmers and ranchers of this province were asking for this.

Another thing that's been coming up. This has been coming up a lot. You know, we know that workplace safety on farms and ranches is of utmost concern. The accident numbers that come out from farms and ranches are not accurate. Anything that happens on farmland and anything that happens on a ranch qualifies: unrelated car accidents, heart attacks. Anything that would be a home-related accident is actually considered a farm accident because your farmhouse is right on your ranch.

Now, you know, I'm not going to minimize farm accidents and farm safety. I know about this, and I know about it first-hand. There have been enough incidents that I've seen that make me fully appreciate how dangerous a job it can be. In fact, that's how I got into farming and ranching. It was because of a farming workplace accident.

My wife's family are farmers and ranchers in Consort. My brother-in-law was the youngest in the family of four, and he was going to take over the family farm. At 26 years of age he was working down at the feedlot, and there was an auger in one of the bins. When you're finished using an auger, you will make sure – farmers and ranchers know this – that the auger is empty. This particular auger still had grain in the top, so when he went to move the auger, it started to tip over. It was big, and there was a lot of weight in it. He tried to hold it down, but my brother-in-law was unable to do that. It threw him in the air. He either hit his head on the way up or on the ground. It left him a quadriplegic, and he later passed away. Because of this there was a family decision that was made by my wife and me. We were in Vancouver at that time. We moved to Consort, and we started our life on the ranch.

I know that every farmer has stories like this, and we all know about farm safety. Family farms and their employees are just that; they're part of the family. We take care of family. Last night I listened to the Leader of the Opposition talk about ranchers, talk about them not paying their bills, that because there's no minimum wage, they're going to pay $3 an hour – as if somebody is actually going to work at $3 an hour – and that there would be no obligation to pay. I mean, it's just outrageous, the kind of things that I was hearing from her as well as from the opposition, claiming that they're going to shortchange their employees. I mean, how ridiculous.

I left the farming business 10 years ago. At that time we were paying temporary employees 20 bucks an hour. That's a decade ago. It's called the marketplace. The marketplace dictates the wage. As far as not paying, you're in a contract with this person when you hire them; of course you're going to pay.

You know, also, another thing that this addresses – and it's a good one – is that there are farms such as berry farms that are out there. They operate on, well, a minimum type of a wage plus a production wage. They incentivize their staff. They'll have a wage plus an amount based upon, say, the amount or the weight per hour that you bring in in production through the day. Actually, it can be quite lucrative for their employees. But the raising of the minimum wage slowed down their production. It actually decreased production on these farms. This helped to address that issue.

You know, talking about Bill 6 and some of the rules and the regulations that came forward, some friends of mine that are farming in that Consort area have a 1,000-head cow-calf operation. It's basically him and his brother that work the farm, and they have one employee. What Bill 6 did was that it gave them so much fear about having their staff work with cattle that they wouldn't let them work with cattle anymore. The two brothers could work with the cattle, but their employee had to go and do other work because of that fear that somebody may get injured. The OH and S regulations that came forward, et cetera: it's not practical. The employee wasn't happy either. A person that's working on a farm and a ranch: they want to be working with cattle. That's what they love. They love animals. Now they're being told that they couldn't do it just because of some silly regulations.

Bill 6 took these OH and S regulations and applied them directly to the cattle industry, and it didn't make any sense. You know, I'll tell you something. Cattle: they don't listen. Cattle don't follow procedure. I'll tell you that. It's not like you're going to work on a boiler and can take a set procedure and work step by step through it and that every time it's going to be exactly the same. Cattle don't work like that.

As far as timing is concerned and hours, you know, on our feedlot – we had a feedlot – in the spring we had cattle in that had to be fed, and you have to look at animal health every day. But then you have an overlap there, where you're seeding and you're calving. The hours that are necessary here: they're odd. They're odd hours. Those calves have got to be checked every three hours, certainly. If you have a heifer calving, you're going to be sitting there watching her for a while. You cannot have strict, set-out hours because animals lives can be at risk.

Once again, Madam Speaker, I am very happy to see Bill 6 come forward. I think this is a very practical approach. It makes sense, and farmers and ranchers asked for it. Thank you once again to the minister for bringing this forward.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available.

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, would the minister like to close debate? The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Dreeshen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think that it's great to see all the differing opinions on this bill. Again, it's gone to Committee of the Whole twice. I think that it's the first bill that we've had here in this Chamber that's achieved that. It goes to show the importance.

Again, the great leadership of our House leader and his respect for democracy to be able to have that flexibility and allowing further debates on bills and issues that are near and dear to the hearts of both sides of the House: I would commend him on that procedural endeavour.

Also, Madam Speaker, I'm thrilled to see that we've come so far. I know that this may be our last day here in the Chamber, and in the spirit of Christmas it's great to see something that I think might be a great gift to the farming community right before Christmas.

Thank you very much. I would like to move closure of debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 26 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 20 Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Chair: Are there any speakers? The hon. Member for Edmonton-North West.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I rise with great interest to have further discussion around Bill 20. Again, we find that bills 20, 21, and then 22, which passed through this House at lightning speed, were all omnibus bills with many egregious elements to them. Quite frankly, it takes a while for people to unpack each part of this substantial bill and provide some constructive criticism for each section.

The part that I want to just talk about here today: you'll find it on page 64 of Bill 20. I can see everybody furiously getting out their bills. How many pages are in this bill in total, anyway? It is unbelievable, right? A hundred and two pages, at least nine or 10 different major sections, changing the landscape of everything from personal income tax – this is the creepy tax-creep bill that will take $600 million out of the pockets of everybody, really. It's an income tax hike that doesn't exclude any Albertan, really, maybe the very richest. It's entirely possible if they have very clever tax lawyers, I guess. It moves through, you know, anything from the green line, as we've talked about before, to taking a shot at the film and television industry, with tech industries leaving the province. You know, it's just a train wreck, Madam Chair.

But the area that I want to talk about here this morning is on page 64 of the bill, and this is in regard to postsecondary learning. The essence of this section is to establish enrolment targets for postsecondary institutions around the province. Again, this is a radical departure from how our postsecondary institutions did administer themselves and work on the ground to ensure that they are meeting the demand for various sorts of training and making decisions based on what the needs are for industry as well.

Here we have, in the midst of all of that, a long-standing tradition of postsecondary institutions making sound and considered decisions around funding various departments and so forth. For example, NAIT and SAIT have, you know, their very organic way by which they determine spaces for trades, let's say. We can take the examples of plumber and pipefitter. Currently this is determined by positions for apprenticeship. This is a very reasonable way, by which you have a connection between hands-on training over a period of years for an apprentice and then moving back into the classroom from time to time, in either NAIT or SAIT, to receive more formal instruction as part of the apprenticeship program. It works pretty well.

You know, I hear lots of noises from this government about wanting to emphasize the trades, for example, and, you know, that is very interesting. Here we are now on page 64 of Bill 20, where the long arm of the bureaucratic interference of this government is moving into making enrolment targets from the desk of the minister of postsecondary education. I love to – well, I don't love it. I mean, we hear ad nauseam from this government about how they want to free the marketplace and all this kind of thing – right? – and then here we are with another example of them reaching deep into postsecondary education and building an infrastructure for them to determine, from the lofty desk of the postsecondary minister, enrolment targets for postsecondary institutions around the province.

I mean, I find this to be a huge problem. I find it to be going against the principles of reason and common sense that have determined the various departments that we have in our postsecondary institutions for learning, you know, a whole universe of relevant and useful things that help to drive our economy, to help build better citizenship, to upgrade individuals so that they can have a more fulfilling life, to increase economic opportunities for people in a reasonably equitable way, which is what we use education for, to reduce barriers for individuals to better themselves both as individuals and as workers and so forth. But here we have the government, this UCP government, reaching in and changing all of that.

It's a problem, Madam Chair, quite frankly. I know that postsecondary institutions are not happy about this. Slowly this information is disseminating amongst students as well. I mean, this is a change that will affect the future prospects of thousands of students that are, let's say, probably in grade school right now, where you're literally changing their ability to make choices about what sort of education they want to get, what sort of future they might be pursuing. Instead, you have the long arm of the UCP government in Edmonton telling people what to do and what to learn based on setting enrolment targets from the central planning committee of the UCP politburo or whatever they call it. Oh, I guess it's called the cabinet, right? You know, that is a problem.

Fortunately, though, Madam Chair, we're here to help, right? The Official Opposition is here. We work day and night to make sure that we provide constructively critical amendments to make life better for Albertans and even make life better, quite frankly, for the UCP government. This will help them, you know, have a more judicious and expeditious governance of postsecondary education by not going down the road of setting enrolment targets, enrolment quotas for individual departments in our postsecondary institutions around the province.

So it's kind of like an early Christmas gift, Madam Chair, from our Official Opposition to the government here for us to consider. I have an amendment that I think will help, help everyone, and I expect no thanks but, rather, a robust debate on the amendment that I have for this section of Bill 20.

Thank you.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A5.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-North West, please proceed.

Mr. Eggen: Okay. Thanks, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, be amended in section 24 in the proposed section 122.1 by striking out "in consultation with public post-secondary institutions" wherever it appears and substituting "after consultation of not less than 6 months with public post-secondary institutions, and their affected faculties and students."

That's a pretty good compromise, I think. Really, I think that the government has little to no business sticking their fingers into setting quotas for postsecondary institutions. They do a very good job of managing those things – thank you very much – already. So, you know, this amendment kind of gives a little bit of a nod to perhaps whatever thought processes, or lack thereof, went into this particular section of Bill 20. My amendment here, then, compels at least the government to enter into a consultation period for a number of months and includes the public in that consultation, too – right? – including the students. Lord knows, the students should have a say in how their education goes. They pay tens of thousands of dollars to go to school, and suddenly, if they hear that the minister from Edmonton suddenly pulls the rug out from their studies, then they should have this period of time to both maybe take a sober second look at that decision and indeed have a consultation around it with the teachers and the students and the administration of said postsecondary institution.

At this point in time, Madam Chair, you know, we need to, I think, repair some damage that's taken place over these last couple of months. This government went in hard and created a lot of shock and consternation around their attitude towards postsecondary education. We saw them, for example, opening the door in their very own documentation to 21 to 23 per cent tuition increases over the next few years. They've taken away the ability for students to claim a tax credit for their tuition – right? – which many people depended on to balance their modest budgets as a student and to continue on with their studies. You see this attempt in Bill 20 to set quotas and targets for university and for colleges and trades and so forth as well.

I mean, I think that we also saw a huge operating cut to grants to various postsecondary institutions. We saw the complete elimination of the maintenance grant for postsecondary institutions, which is astounding, quite frankly. In a broader sense, if we cast our eye a bit broader, we saw the elimination of the STEP program, that thousands of students depended on to, you know, help pay for education by getting jobs in their field, which is a very essential part of, I think, a modern approach to education, to get experience in perhaps a related field that you're studying in so that you can add that to your resumé and become more employable in time.

The list goes on, Madam Chair, of I think a concerted attack on postsecondary education, of which this section of Bill 20 is one. I'm offering some small change here in regard to making it at least a little more democratic and using the expertise and the experience on the ground and in the field between various administrations for different universities and colleges to talk about where they're going to go, put their priorities forward for education, and, of course, involve the students and the general public in that exercise, discussion as well. It's a pretty fair amendment, I think. It's nice. It's compact. Like I said, it's kind of like a little Christmas present here before the actual festivities begin. I believe that this amendment will help to assuage some of the other divisions and conflict that this government has created around postsecondary education.

I will cede the floor to others to talk about this, and I look forward to the discussion. Thank you.

The Chair: Any members wishing to speak to amendment A5? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair, and I'm pleased to rise in support of the amendment that's been brought forward by my friend from Edmonton-North West. I want to thank him for trying to make what is a terrible piece of legislation a little less terrible.

It was interesting, Madam Chair, that during the estimates discussion with the Member for Calgary-Bow he stated that his goal was to increase Alberta's postsecondary participation rate, which up until recently has been the lowest in the country. That's nothing that anybody should be proud of here in this room. If we want to have a vibrant, dynamic, growing province, we need more students to be going to university or college in this province, and I applaud the Member for Calgary-Bow for stating that his goal is to increase participation rates in postsecondary education here in the province of Alberta. Just for the record that was also my goal when I was Minister of Advanced Education in the last government because participation rates in postsecondary education have been flat for a number of years. It's interesting, though, the different approaches that he and I took to the issue of increasing student participation in postsecondary education. It was our view as a government that in order to get more students into universities and colleges, those institutions needed funding to run their operations. That's why we increased funding for universities and colleges by 2 per cent every year.

They also needed new classroom spaces, and that's why we invested in a significant expansion of infrastructure on campuses all across the province. The new science complex at the University of Lethbridge just opened up this year. That has dramatically expanded classroom capacity at the University of Lethbridge. The government is still investing in the renewal of the MacKimmie complex at the University of Calgary. That will dramatically expand classroom facilities at the University of Calgary. We invested in the renewal of the Dentistry/Pharmacy building at the University of Alberta. That building was being almost unused because it was in such a state of disrepair, and investing in the renewal of that building will dramatically increase the number of classroom spaces that are available to students at the University of Alberta.

We invested in a new campus in High Prairie for Northern Lakes College, which was desperately needed. High Prairie campus of Northern Lakes College was an old Alberta forestry trailer that had any number of dead animals in the air space between the bottom of the trailer and the ground surface, which, I joked with the chair of Northern Lakes College, provided all-you-could-eat meals for the students there if they were interested in that. That, fortunately, won't be the case any longer, and the students in High Prairie will have a modern, expanded classroom space in which they can conduct their learning.

You know, we increased funding that was available for their operations. We dramatically increased support for expanding classroom spaces. We invested in maintaining the existing classroom spaces because the previous government had left a significant infrastructure deficit behind on campuses all across the province. That was the institutional side of the investments that we made in order to increase public participation rates.

Oh, we also invested in new tech seats. Our plan was to invest $50 million over five years to increase the number of seats in tech-related programs by approximately 3,000 spaces. I appreciate that the government is still planning to continue funding for the 400 or so spaces that were created in the last days of our government. It's a shame that the government is not going to continue to invest in those spaces, that are much needed, or were, at least until the government decided that it was not interested in supporting development of the tech sector in Alberta. I guess that if we're not going to support the development of tech-related industries in the province, there's no need in continuing to invest in tech-related education spaces in universities and colleges according to how the members opposite approach the issue of economic diversification.

That was the institutional side, Madam Chair. Then, of course, we recognize that finances are a huge barrier to many students attending university and college. I can't tell you how many potential students I met during my tenure in Advanced Education and still meet today who rule out the possibility of even going to university or college because they think that they can't afford it. We tried to tackle that by freezing tuition rates for four years. We also froze mandatory noninstructional fees for the same period of time and eliminated the ability of institutions to introduce new mandatory noninstructional fees, which meant that during the last four years Alberta went from the most expensive place to go to university to the middle of the pack. While other provinces were increasing their university tuition and fees, ours remained flat, so comparatively it became much more affordable to go to university or college in Alberta than in other jurisdictions in the country.

We dramatically expanded access to student loans, and we kept those student loan rates affordable. We increased the number of scholarships and grants that were available. We introduced the indigenous grant, which provided tuition and fee support for indigenous students who were studying at university or college. We created an apprenticeship grant for apprentices who weren't employed but wanted to continue with their technical training. That resulted in thousands of unemployed apprentices being at least able to continue in their technical training while they were still trying to find work so that they had the technical skills to be able to advance their apprenticeship.

We also invested significantly in mental health supports for students so that students who were already in university or college and experiencing the stress related to studies and all of the things that go on for young people while they're in university or college could get the help that they needed. So not only were they healthy, but they were well enough that they could continue on with their studies and complete the programs that they were in so that they were able to graduate. That was also a significant support for students.

Now, contrast that approach with the approach that the Member for Calgary-Bow was taking in trying to increase participation rates. He's scrapping the education and tuition tax credits, so that will make it less affordable for students to go to school. He's scrapping the tuition fee freeze and allowing universities and colleges to increase tuition by up to 20 per cent over the next four years, so that's going to be another fee hike. He's also increasing the rate of interest on student loans. It's going from prime to prime plus 1 and a half, I believe. That's going to be a significant hit for the tens of thousands of student loan holders already in the system. All of those legislated fee increases are going to hit students severely.

Included in that have to be the indirect fee increases that are going to result from the cuts that the Member for Calgary-Bow is making to the university and college grants. They have to make that money up somehow. They can't make it all up from tuition, so all of the ancillary fees related to going to university or college are going to go up. That means that residence fees are going to be more expensive, meal plan fees are going to be more expensive, and parking fees are going to be more expensive. We've already seen a number of universities announce increases to those fees for the next year. All of those things are going to make it much less affordable for Alberta's potential students to go to university. I think that's going to have a chilling effect. There are a lot of people who are in high school or junior high right now who are wondering whether or not they can even afford to go to university or college, and they're going to decide to not go because the Member for Calgary-Bow and this government have made the financial barriers to getting a university or college education too high for many of them to overcome.

In addition to that, though, not only is the Member for Calgary-Bow making it more expensive for students to go to school, but he's also reducing the capacity of universities and colleges to undertake their work. He's got a plan to reduce the government grants by half over the next period of years. Not only will we not be able to increase enrolment in most programs; it's going to mean reduced enrolment in most programs and the elimination entirely of a lot of programs, we suspect. It's already having a negative effect on postsecondary education. We see hundreds of people being laid off at the University of Calgary already, and we expect hundreds more to be laid off at institutions all across the province in the coming days.

In addition, of course, the capital grants have been reduced to a paltry $12 million, from $120 million to $12 million, over the next fiscal year, Madam Chair. Universities and colleges won't even be able to afford to replace their light bulbs with that little money. Construction of new projects has ground to a halt. This government has committed to building almost nothing new on university and college campuses over the next three or four years. I don't know. I honestly can't see how the Member for Calgary-Bow is going to increase public participation in postsecondary education when he's making it way more expensive for students to go to school, eliminating their ability to deliver most programs, and saying that they can't build any new classroom spaces over the next four years. When pressed, the Member for Calgary-Bow really didn't have a good answer. I suspect that these enrolment targets are one of the tools he expects to use to increase participation rates, but how is he going to do that?

One of the things that is true about the postsecondary sector is that the level of compliance you get with government direction is directly related to the amount of money that you give them in government grants. Universities and colleges are not like schools, where they get all of their funding from the provincial government and have very tight control over curriculum, enrolment, all of those things. Universities and colleges are much more independent from government direction than the primary school system and the secondary school system, and that's the way it should be, Madam Chair. I couldn't imagine what universities and colleges would look like if the members opposite had direct control over what they would offer. I suspect that the University of Alberta would have only two faculties, a faculty for oil and a faculty for gas, and everything else would be shut down.

It's critical to the academic enterprise that government intervention be limited as far as possible. That's why we're bringing forward this amendment, so that at least the Member for Calgary-Bow can't get up in the morning and arbitrarily decide to cut enrolment to a philosophy program at the University of Calgary by 75 per cent and mandate an increase in – I don't know – petroleum engineering at the University of Alberta by 150 per cent just at his own whim. I think that my friend from Edmonton-North West is correct in saying that these enrolment targets need to be set at least in consultation with public postsecondary institutions over a period of six months to make sure that all of those consultations consider the affected faculties and students.

Six months is a reasonable period of time for conducting these consultations. Academic institutions are not nimble organizations, let's say, and they make the direct civil service appear fast and lean in comparison. Six months is a reasonable time, I think, for academic institutions to conduct these consultations to see whether or not the enrolment targets that the Member for Calgary-Bow wants to impose on them will be reasonable. I think that it makes sense to include everybody who has a stake in the future of the postsecondary system to have their say as to whether or not these enrolment targets make sense.

Like I said, in an ideal world we wouldn't be discussing this kind of legislation at all. The minister would just let universities and colleges continue to do the good work that they've already been doing for a number of years, consulting with industry and consulting with the public already to set their enrolment targets. They already do that, Madam Chair. A number of programs at universities and colleges all across the province already have committees comprising students and faculty and potential employers to look at the program, whether or not it's meeting everybody's needs, and decide how the programs can be improved to do that. I don't think that allowing the Member for Calgary-Bow and his cabinet colleagues to get their fingers into the process will improve things. I think it will actually damage the academic enterprise.

Of course, we've already seen that certain members across the way don't have a lot of respect for academics in the first place. We know that the Member for Calgary-Lougheed has accused professors of being communists. You know, he's tried to smear the name of an expert in political science by making allegations that her work is unworthy because of her affiliation with the federal NDP. So this is all part of a pattern, Madam Chair, of undermining the academic enterprise, broadly speaking.

I think that this amendment will at least limit the amount of damage that the members opposite are seeking to do to our postsecondary education sector, and I think it would be wise for all members of this Assembly to vote in favour of this amendment so that we have a rational and reasonable process, at the very least, for setting enrolment targets rather than just allowing the minister at his own discretion to set them without consultation, without any consideration to the effects that his decisions will have.

With that, Madam Chair, I encourage all of my colleagues here in the House to vote in favour of this amendment, and I want to thank again my friend from Edmonton-North West for bringing forward such a reasonable amendment and at least trying his hardest to limit the damage to postsecondary education that this bill in its original form is set to do.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A5? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to address this very wrong-headed bill and to talk about some of the concerns that have been expressed across the province of Alberta about the single-minded and negative perspective that is being taken by this government with regard to its finances and specifically with regard to the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, which reveals quite significantly the government's lack of understanding of the work that's being done across this province to redeem us from some of the difficult economic times that we've had over the last few years.

I think that we can see, by reading the daily paper, that judgment is already in on this bill and all of the economic bills of this government when we see in the last few days Moody's bond-rating agency downgrading the province of Alberta because their economic plan fails to take into account any future thinking. They specifically cite, of course, particular aspects of that failure with regard to a complete failure of looking at the revenue side of the question in this province and a complete failure to . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, we're on amendment A5.

Mr. Feehan: I do understand that. I'm talking . . .

The Chair: Okay. I assumed you were getting there.

Mr. Feehan: Yeah. Certainly.

Moody's also talked about a failure to move off the reliance that we've had on our natural resources in this province, not that we shouldn't have done what we did to try to generate as much income as we could from our natural resources. The issue that Moody's cites is the failure to understand that a singular emphasis is unacceptable. As a result, we have a downgrade, and this is what brings us to this amendment here, and that is that the government is failing to understand that if we actually are going to resolve the economic problems in this province, we need to create as much diversity as we possibly can in this province. That diversity depends on the ability to understand where the economies of the world are going and to ensure that we are ready to take advantage of and be a part of those movements in the economies of the world.

11:00

We know, for example, that tech industries are absolutely on the rise around the world. More and more we are seeing people not driving trucks to make a living but, rather, working on computers to make a living. While we'll need a quite wide range, including truck drivers and so on, we know that the majority of jobs will come from these kinds of tech industry jobs. We see Mary Moran of Calgary Economic Development telling us that we have lost a significant digital company, who bailed out of this province because of the focus of this particular government. We have seen the loss of tech jobs at universities because of this government's failure to continue with the plan that had been put forward by the previous government, all of this telling us that the government is trying to pick a singular winner in terms of Alberta's future instead of allowing the marketplace of ideas to move forward and create places in our universities that are responsive to the needs of the community around them.

In this particular case, the government has decided that as well as not supporting universities through the various programs that we have, they would actually begin to try to control universities by introducing themselves into the question of enrolment in various programs. Now, this is problematic on a number of levels because one of the things that's quite clear to me is that this government doesn't understand the nature and value of the universities in this province. While we were capping tuition fees in this province to encourage more students to go to universities, while we were providing more money to universities so that they could provide services for students, while we were building more classroom spaces at universities and colleges around this province and we were funding particular spots in the tech industry, doing all of these positive things, we see this government instead taking away tax credits. We see the government reducing the students' ability to attend university by increasing tuition. All of these things are attacking universities instead of supporting universities to do the good work that they do.

Given that they do not seem to understand the function of a university in society, I'm very concerned about them having the ability to begin to dictate to universities the nature of enrolment. As a result, I think it's very important that they step aside, that they go back to the people who actually know a lot about enrolment, how to encourage enrolment, how to establish enrolment in relationship to the needs of the society around us, and allow them to do that. Universities and colleges all have programs in which they look at enrolment enhancement. It's a common practice at every university to have those discussions on an ongoing basis. They design programs based on that, not based on the whim of the government in order to support a particular industry but, rather, on the long-term trends that are needed in a community or a province. Those are the people that government should be working with to ensure that they have the right enrolment processes in place.

Government's role should be to provide them the resources to do that well, but they're taking away all of the resources to do these kinds of things rather than providing those resources, something that doesn't make sense. If you want something to succeed, why would you suffocate it? Why would you make it more difficult for it to happen? Why would you create structural barriers that make it more unlikely that the thing that you want is going to occur?

I think that we've learned a lot over the last number of years about how small factors can make a difference in terms of people's decision-making and that those factors often are not understood well by the people who are making the decision yet strongly influence their decisions. Many people have had the opportunity to read, for example, the book called Nudge, which tells us a number of stories about how people's decision-making can be influenced by just making sure that the easiest decision, the most straightforward decision is the one that has the greatest benefit and the greatest outcome. For example, in the book they talk about people applying for life insurance, and if the number on your form when you first sign up is different, then you're more likely to actually put money aside for insurance. It has nothing to do with people making a judgment about it. It's just what happened to be on the form when they signed it when they got employment.

From that, we learn that it's important that we understand: what are those structural kinds of barriers that tend to make people make a decision one way or the other? If our ultimate outcome is to increase the enrolment at a university, then we should look at: what are the kinds of things that are more likely to make a student want to go back to school? Well, the things that are going to make them want to go back to school are the belief that they'll be able to be successful in doing that, the belief that they will be able to get the monies that they need in order to be able to go to school, that they will be able to pay off those bills in a reasonable amount of time with whatever type of job they're able to earn when they graduate, that they will have good learning experiences at those schools, that they will have good instructors and good professors who will provide them with the knowledge that they need in order to be successful in the economy, that they'll have the resources at those schools such as the classrooms, the labs, the library facilities that will allow them to be successful.

Creating all of those opportunities is more likely to have people make the decision to go to a postsecondary institution, whether it's a college, a university, or a technical institution. Those are the kinds of decisions we should be making, but what we see is this government going in exactly the opposite direction. We see the government undermining the confidence of students about their own success or the success of their university to be able to provide them the resources that they need. We think it's really important that this government step back, that this government let universities do what universities do well, let colleges do what colleges do well and technical institutions do that as well, and that is for them to use good research to make decisions about enrolment and not political ideas in terms of, you know, what kind of behaviours on the part of the university will increase enrolment.

We know that, you know, frequently on this side of the House we present evidence to the government from various universities that indicates that the choices that they're making are not going to achieve the results that the government thinks they're going to achieve. We've demonstrated time and time again that trickle-down economics, for example, doesn't work. We've indicated time and time again that minimum wage is a good way to ensure that people at the lower income have the monies that they need to survive well and that increasing minimum wage does not damage small businesses.

All of these are pieces that came from universities that were able to use good research and appropriately developed statistics in order to demonstrate the basis on which social policies should be made, yet the government has rejected all of this good research all the time, again demonstrating a distaste for the knowledge that comes from universities, a disbelief that the people who have created that knowledge bring value to our society, and that's very problematic here. The overall trend in this government has been to decide that academics and scholarly learning are not worth supporting and are not to be believed in terms of making policy decisions, which is very concerning for many of us because it is that kind of knowledge development which has allowed us as a province and, of course, all western democracies to develop a very good lifestyle for a significant number of people in this province and, of course, across Canada and across the western world.

It is the academics in engineering and the academics in history and the academics in nursing who have all contributed to a better way of being in this province, to a lifestyle which has seen significant reductions in dangers to us in the community, significant increases in general health and well-being, changes that have made the life of the average person much better than it was five years ago, 10 years ago, or 50 years ago. That institution has done that extremely well, and as a result we think it's important that the institution be encouraged to continue to do that kind of work and that we trust the processes of good scientific research and knowledge in order to make decisions. The experts on that development of knowledge are universities and colleges and technical institutions. They are the experts on how to research and evaluate what good information is. They develop the techniques that allow us to do that.

Yet when it comes time for them to use that same scientific reasoning and knowledge to develop their own programs, we suddenly have this government stepping in and saying: we are going to develop a process where it is the minister who begins to force enrolment in a particular area based on the minister's whims or needs. You know, this is perplexing given that just this morning we were listening to the minister of agriculture talking about the fact that we need to trust the experts in the field. He was talking about farmers. If I accept that, then why does he suddenly abandon that principle when it comes to people who are experts in other areas such as research and knowledge development? It doesn't make sense unless you really didn't believe the first one. Then I wonder: why the second? Why interfere with universities who are doing the work that they need to do in order to ensure that they have good enrolment?

Now, one of the problems is that we have a province that has a lower rate of enrolment in postsecondary than other provinces, so one of the things that we need to ask ourselves is why that is. What kind of research can we apply that would tell us the reasoning behind our lower enrolment? Well, lo and behold, it turns out that some of this research has been done, and it turns out that part of the reason why we have lower enrolment in this province is because fewer young men go to postsecondary than in other provinces. The reason why that happens is because they have had the fortune of being able to earn good incomes without getting a postsecondary education. We've been very fortunate in the oil and gas field to be able to provide people with income sometimes over $100,000 a year with no more than a grade 12 education. I'm very happy for those people. I'm glad that they've had the opportunity to succeed well and so on.

Overall, looking around the world, we know that that's an aberration, that we're not going to be able to depend on those kind of lucrative, productive kinds of jobs forever in this province, and as a result we need a different kind of job, a job that depends on people having the opportunity to upgrade their skills, to improve their circumstances through their own effort. That means going to postsecondary institutions where they can learn a set of skills that they would not naturally have had if they did not have the opportunity to spend time with good instructors who have spent many years developing skill sets and knowledge that they can pass on to students. That should be encouraged. It should be encouraged in this province that people who want to do well are given the tools to do well.

We know that in some fields it hasn't been necessary in the past in order to be able to get a good income in this province to have those kinds of postsecondary credentials to move on. But that's not the rule across the world. Across the world there is a very close relationship between postsecondary education and longer term financial stability. We need to understand that that's what the research indicates, and if that's what the research indicates, then we should use that good knowledge created by good postsecondary institutions in order to build toward the future. That's what universities and colleges and technical institutions have been doing and doing well for many, many decades in this province.

Many of us here in this Chamber are quite proud to be graduates of institutions around the province of Alberta. Myself, I graduated from both the University of Alberta and the University of Calgary. I know many other people in this House have graduated from NAIT or SAIT or Mount Royal or MacEwan or many of the other great institutions in this province. I'd like to ask at this time for the government to show some respect for those institutions and to thank them for having provided them with the background necessary in order to be able to be as successful as we have been in this House. We thank them by honouring their strengths and their abilities and by including them in the decision-making regarding their own lives, and that is the concern of student enrolment numbers and program enrolment.

Thank you.

The Chair: Are there other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm grateful for the opportunity to speak to this amendment on Bill 20. The amendment reads that we take out the words "in consultation with public post-secondary institutions" wherever it appears and substitute "after consultation of not less than 6 months with public post-secondary institutions, and their affected faculties and students."

Well, you can imagine my surprise as I listened to the last speech, that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford gave, Madam Chair, and you would be surprised with how much of what he said I agreed with. Yes, you heard that correctly. He said a lot of things that I agree with entirely. He said things like: let postsecondary institutions do what postsecondary institutions do well. I couldn't agree more. That's exactly what our legislation intends to do. He said that postsecondary institutions are the experts in the field and that we should listen to them, and that is exactly what I believe our minister of postsecondary education has done and what this legislation does. He does talk about the failure of what's gone on in the past. He talked about lower rates of enrolment and lower graduation rates, and I agree with that as well.

The fact is, Madam Chair, that this legislation is designed to actually take the handcuffs off of these postsecondary institutions and release the entrepreneurial abilities that they have. The NDP refused to take off those handcuffs and refused to open up the entrepreneurial knowledge and expertise that are in those institutions. They essentially kept them prisoner: "You will take the amount of money we give you. You're not allowed to raise any more. You will do what we say." They were very dictatorial and didn't allow them to be entrepreneurial, didn't allow them to raise their own money. We are actually doing essentially, through the legislation, what the hon. member had said we should do. Interestingly enough, it's what the government he used to be a part of refused to do.

The hon. member actually knew what to do. Their government just didn't do it. Well, this government isn't like that, Madam Chair. This government is going to work with the postsecondary institutions to allow them to express through their expertise the entrepreneurial abilities that they have to raise money in other ways; to bring in the private sector, perhaps, in different ways; to do land development on some of the university lands to create rent and lease revenue and other revenue from that; to actually be entrepreneurial and invest that money that they are now allowed to make, that they weren't allowed to make under the NDP, and invest it back into their postsecondary institution to improve the quality of education for their students and improve the quality of life for their students as they graduate.

What's interesting is that the hon. member that just spoke before – while I agree with much of what he said, the fact is that his government didn't do those things, and that's what several postsecondary institutions that I've talked to have said. They've said: "Listen, if you are going to give us less money in terms of direct funding, then you'd better take off the handcuffs. Let us raise some of our own money. We actually know how to do that." When they find out that we're going to give them that ability, they're actually in many cases quite pleased, more pleased than they have been in the past.

In fact, the hon. member said it himself when he talked about some of the stats. There is lower enrolment in Alberta, and of those enrolled, there's lower graduation than there should be.

Now, listen, anytime I talk to students, the ones that are in school and the ones that haven't gone to school yet, they say that – you know what? – they would like lower tuition. But when you extend the conversation past the first sentence, here's what they understand. They realize the choice. They're bright. Young people are bright, and they understand this. Sometimes I ask them: "So would you rather pay less during the four years that you're in school and then pay more for the 45 years that you're working after you graduate to support more of everybody else's school? Or would you rather pay a little more in your tuition and pay less for the 45 years that you're working for everybody else?"

Let me say this, Madam Chair. Not all of those students agree. They didn't all have the same answer. Some have just said: "Lower tuition. That's it. That's all I am interested in." But a lot of other ones have said: "You know, when you look at it that way, when you consider the 45 years during which I'm going to hopefully have a good-paying job and the government is going to be taking up to 40, 50 per cent of everything I earn in different forms of taxes, boy, having that lighter tax load for 45 years may be a positive offset to a little more tuition that I pay while I'm going to school." Again, not all students feel the same way about that. There are students on both sides of that argument. But I think, largely, they understand the argument.

I would say that the problem is that the NDP didn't understand the argument. They think that government should control everything, that government should tell the institutions how much money they're going to have and keep them coming to the government every year with the beggar's bowl to get enough money to hopefully run their programs. Well, governments of all stripes sometimes aren't the most reliable partners. Sometimes they're quite reliable; sometimes they're not that reliable. The postsecondary institutions in many cases would like to rely on themselves. That's one of the messages that we've heard. They would like to have the handcuffs off so that they can be entrepreneurial, so that they can raise some more of their money.

Let's face it, Madam Chair. Having emphasis on the postsecondary institutions to make sure that their students graduate and their students get good jobs thereafter is the best way to increase their students' quality of life. The one calculation when somebody finishes school is: how much money do you owe for going to school? That's a really important number, and we should never forget about that.

The other half of that calculation, that I think students understand, is: how many years is it going to take me working to pay that money back? If you owe a large amount of money and you can pay it back in a low number of years, that's not that bad. If you owe a little bit of money but it still takes you a long time to pay it back because of the employment position you might have, well, what looks good at the outset may not be so good at all if it takes a long, long time to pay off those students loans. So while I understand that every situation is different, I guess my point is that students understand that also. They understand the value of having a good career and a good job after they graduate and how that affects their quality of life thereafter.

Madam Chair, we intend to work with the postsecondary institutions. That's what our minister said. The folks across have said several times that he hasn't given good answers, but in fact they just didn't want to hear the good answers. They didn't want to hear that there's a different way to do it than to keep the postsecondary institutions as, essentially, beggars to the government. Rather, unleash the expertise that the previous member talked about.

I agree with what he said. They have tremendous expertise. They understand the research. There are many things that they're very good at. Our government wants to take the handcuffs off them, unlike the NDP, and say: "Okay. Be experts. We know you're experts; be experts. We know you can be entrepreneurial; be entrepreneurial. Raise money. Do other things that can improve the quality of education and the quality of life for students because we are going to take the handcuffs off you."

It's a different way of looking at things, a way that I would suggest to you the previous government was not willing to accept. Actually, if the previous government had listened to the very experts the previous speaker was talking about, that's what they were saying. That's what the postsecondary institutions were saying to us even while the NDP was in government: "They just don't let us do anything. They don't let us raise money. We could, but they won't let us. They want to control everything."

So, in fact, the place where I will disagree with the previous speaker is – what's different, I believe, about our approach is that the previous government wanted to control every element of what every school did, and we're saying: "No. We're going to give you a little less money upfront than you used to get, but we are going to unleash your ability to raise money, to be entrepreneurial, to be the captain of your own ship, to row your own boat, and to set your own direction."

You know, there's an old saying that is consistent with this, that the one who pays the piper calls the tune. Well, when the government is paying all the money, it's no wonder that under the NDP they wanted to call all the tunes. I guess from this side of the House we're saying that we're going to let the universities and the other postsecondaries raise some of their own money and call some more of their own tunes. We think that's consistent. We think that's fair, and we think it's actually consistent with what most of the postsecondary institutions have been telling us.

It's also inconsistent with this amendment in front of us because the amendment says to consult for six months. What the opposition doesn't realize is that our minister, unlike the previous government, actually talked to the postsecondary institutions before this legislation rolled out.

An Hon. Member: He is a doctor.

Mr. McIver: He's a PhD himself. I'm certainly not, but I believe he can speak to the postsecondaries on an academic level like I never could.

He actually did it, more to the point. He actually took the time to talk to the postsecondary institutions, to find out that they wanted to be more entrepreneurial, which is why this amendment, Madam Chair, would actually make the legislation worse instead of better, which is also why this side of the House will not be supporting it.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-West Henday on amendment A5.

Mr. Carson: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a privilege to rise to speak to this amendment to Bill 20, once again, amending section 24 in the proposed section 122.1 by striking out "in consultation with public post-secondary institutions" wherever it appears and substituting "after consultation of not less than 6 months with public post-secondary institutions, and their affected faculties and students."

Madam Chair, it is indeed, as I just mentioned, a privilege to rise in this House, and I think that we also need to recognize that it is a privilege, first of all, of course, that we are in this House in the first place, that we were elected here by our constituents, but also that we have the privilege to be sitting here at the point in our careers that we are in, most of us, I believe, out of postsecondary education, and at the wages that we receive, the compensation we receive as private members elected to this House, debating why the government thinks it's okay to increase costs for postsecondary students, people who because of this government are now facing reductions in minimum wages if they're under 17 or 18, trying to save to get to postsecondary education.

This government has told them that they do not deserve the same minimum wage as anybody else, which is very concerning. So it is a privilege for us to be standing here telling students – the UCP government is telling students that they think it's okay and actually should be celebrated that they're going to make it harder for students to attain postsecondary education.

Now, I have to say, Madam Chair, that I have great concern with some of the words that were just spoken by the Minister of Transportation and often with the things that are said on that side of the House. I don't have enough time to recognize everything that I have concerns with, but I will do my best here. The Minister of Transportation said that postsecondary institutions have been asking for these changes, have been asking to have enrolment targets forced upon them. I once again, as with most of the things that member says, question who he is hearing that from and would appreciate that that information be tabled if it is true. But the minister said that postsecondary institutions are entrepreneurs and that this government is simply unleashing their potential. By scaling back their funding to the tune of tens of millions if not hundreds of millions of dollars, they are unleashing these postsecondary institutions' entrepreneurial spirit. Unfortunately, I certainly disagree with that point. The fact is that this government is rolling back the amount of funding they get through grants and other means and is telling them that they need to meet arbitrary enrolment targets that this Advanced Education minister is going to once again arbitrarily set out.

Now, the Minister of Transportation just said that this amendment doesn't need to be in there because the Advanced Education minister consulted on enrolment targets already. Well, Madam Chair, that doesn't change the fact that any time this minister comes forward with an arbitrary enrolment target that they want to set out, there should be consultation done. It's one thing to say that these postsecondary institutions were consulted on the idea of enrolment targets, but then to say that they are totally fine with any enrolment targets that might be set out in the future is absolutely ridiculous.

Now, the Minister of Transportation once again also said that we need to listen to these postsecondary institutions, that they're asking for enrolment targets, that they're asking to have their funding reduced because somehow that ties their hands, and so now these institutions are going to be able to unleash their full potential. Well, really, what does that mean, Madam Chair? That means they are going to unleash their full potential to charge more to postsecondary students.

Now, I think about situations in my own family. I've spoken, to some extent, about the fact that my mother was 14 when I was born. She raised me as a single mother until I was about 12 years old, and she worked extremely hard to not miss a beat going through high school and then to further obtain a bachelor of arts degree from university. I think about the impact that pieces of legislation like Bill 20 have and the idea of enrolment targets, that a government should be able to arbitrarily set out targets for what kind of education students should receive, once again not even touching on the fact that this government has rolled back minimum wages for people like my own mother, who was trying to simply get by with what was given to her. It's very concerning, Madam Chair.

Once again, we have a government that is trying to force enrolment targets, that is forcing these institutions, by the reduction of grants and investments to postsecondaries, to actually increase tuition for students, and somehow the government expects us to celebrate that fact.

Now, the fact is, Madam Chair, that when we look at this legislation compared to the last piece of legislation that we were discussing, it's quite clear to see – and we see it every day – that this side of the House and the NDP caucus, compared to the UCP government, have very different ideas about what is good and what is bad regulation. On one hand, we have a government that is taking away regulations that should be in place. On the other hand, where we see regulations that shouldn't be in place like enrolment targets, they are actually putting them there. Of course, it's quite a difference of opinion here and a difference of ideology, but I am very concerned with what we're seeing.

The fact is that this government seems to be taking action to make enemies with every order of government. I'm not exactly sure why, but it continues on with postsecondary institutions. Well, I suppose I have some ideas, and it seems that when we look at the changes that this government has made to advocate roles, they're appointing party insiders, the president of their party at some point, to be the advocate for their constituents when they have concerns with the direction of the government. This UCP government has now put in place one of their party insiders, who is supposed to advocate for these people who have concerns with the direction of the government. Madam Chair, that's concerning.

We see it again with changes to grants and overall funding for nongovernmental agencies. We see a reduction in grants for these organizations because, once again, these organizations are typically the ones that come forward with concerns about the direction of the government, but this government is cutting them off at the knees. Really, we see the direction of this government is that they want to point fingers at anybody but themselves because they don't believe that they should take responsibility for the actions that they are taking.

Once again, when we say that there should be consultation of at least six months with these postsecondary institutions and with their faculties and with students, it is absolutely reasonable that that consultation happen before arbitrary enrolment targets are put in place by this Advanced Education minister, who has their own biases just like any of us do, who has their own ideas of where somebody should go to school or what degree they should be obtaining, which is very concerning.

As the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar mentioned, in his time as the Minister of Advanced Education we went from the most expensive province to obtain advanced education in to middle of the pack because of the tuition freeze. Now, once again, this UCP government is taking that in the opposite direction. They want us, as the Minister of Transportation spoke of, to take the handcuffs off these postsecondary institutions so that they can charge higher rates to students to obtain education.

We see this general philosophy from this UCP government. They truly seem to have something against people that are working to obtain higher levels of education. Once again, we see it from their reduction in minimum wage. We see it from tuition increases. We see it from these enrolment targets that are before us. They truly do not believe that education is the great equalizer. They truly do not believe that students should be able to choose what education they are going to be receiving.

Once again, on top of these arbitrary enrolment targets that this government is trying to put in place, they're scrapping education and tuition credits. The Minister of Transportation seems to support all of these changes. I question who this government consulted that said: we should get rid of education and tuition credits. This government scrapped the tuition freeze, making postsecondary education more unaffordable and making it harder now for students to obtain postsecondary education. This government increased interest on student loans. Really, we are seeing that this government is doing everything in their power to hide the debt that they have created from their $4.7 billion handout, a budget that just yesterday received – well, Moody's gave it a failing grade and reduced our ability to get, at the end of the day, cheaper loans.

This government once again scrapped grants for institutions, which means, as the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford mentioned, higher fees for things like parking and resident fees, which is very concerning. At the end of the day, this government is saying that they've uncuffed the hands of these postsecondary institutions, but what they've done is that they've unleashed the ability for compound levels of fees to be forced on students, not just domestic but international, which is a whole other concern about the fact that this government is going to – really, going back to the fact that we should be aiming to increase the number of people going to postsecondary and achieving degrees and diplomas and certifications, this government is actually working against that entirely through this legislation and the other pieces that we've seen around postsecondary education.

The minister has also said in the past that they plan to reduce grants by half over the next few years, which is very concerning. Once again, postsecondary institutions only have a couple of levers. One of them is receiving funding from the government, of course. So when this minister's direction is that we are going to continue reducing these grants and that if you don't hit these enrolment targets that are arbitrarily set by the minister, that could potentially mean a reduction in funding – we see this carrot-and-stick show from this government day in and day out. They're saying that if you don't meet our demands, we are going to cut your funding, Madam Chair. That's very concerning.

The fact is that this government speaks in coded language around their true motives. It's simply the fact. The Minister of Transportation is the perfect example of it. I've gone on at length about the comments that he's made, but really the fact is that what he's saying, that the government no longer wants to help these students and is going to leave it up to the free market to, at the end of the day, Madam Chair, take advantage of these students, is what is going to happen.

Now, once again I'm going back to thinking about my own mother, who obtained a degree, but it took many years, many, many years, possibly even decades to get rid of the cost of tuition, get rid of that student loan that was taken on at the time of that postsecondary education.

Once again, this minister says that we need to think about whether students want to pay more upfront so that they don't have to pay their fair share in taxes down the road. Madam Chair, that comment was absolutely absurd, to say that somebody might want to pay $20,000, $30,000 more for their tuition right now to obtain their degree so that they might not have to pay, you know, whatever it might be, $10 more a year, to help somebody else get postsecondary education. This is really one of the best contrasting ideas to show what I believe in personally compared to what they believe in. They believe that things should be paid more upfront. It's very concerning, Madam Chair, that this government thinks that it's okay for students to pay tens of thousands more over the next four years. It's very frustrating.

Madam Chair, it's safe to say that I will be supporting this amendment. At the end of the day, it's very common sense. It's straightforward. If this Advanced Education minister plans to force arbitrary enrolment targets on these institutions, it should be consulted on. It's one thing to say that there was consultation done around the idea of enrolment targets, but to say that any enrolment targets set moving forward should not be subject to consultation is absolutely absurd. It is in everyone's best interests – this government, these postsecondary institutions, and the students and faculty there – to have these consultations before putting in these enrolment targets, which may or may not be the right thing to do.

Once again I appreciate my privilege of being to speak to this legislation and this amendment. I think that everyone should take a moment to think about their own privilege when it comes to making postsecondary education more unaffordable for students into the future. I think it would do us all well to think about that.

Madam Chair, once again, thank you very much. I hope everyone will take the time to support this amendment to Bill 20. Thank you.

Mr. McIver: I just can't help but point out that near the end of the rant that we just heard from the hon. member, he compared a $20,000 to $30,000 increase in tuition to paying $10 more a year. Just so the folks watching at home understand how the NDP thinks, they're counting on people that graduate working at least 200 years, and that's without interest payments to pay it back. That's what he would have them do.

I just wanted to say that the hon. member, while he was trying to trash out what was said before, didn't put a lot of thought into what he said, and I think that that's kind of illustrative of his entire speech. I just wanted to point that out.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you very much. It gives me great pleasure to speak to this amendment, which I hope members of this House will support, notwithstanding that the last comment from the Minister of Transportation didn't make a lot of sense. I would hope that you wouldn't support anything he says, because he doesn't make a lot of sense sometimes.

Madam Chair, I do want to say that with university tuition, postsecondary tuition, becoming quite expensive under the UCP government, you know, what we potentially will see is the Minister of Advanced Education getting involved in setting tuition caps on different faculties and those faculties raising the grade point average to get into faculties. If that happens, then we could see, with the handcuffs that the Minister of Transportation said they're taking off universities, universities jacking up the costs of tuition and limiting the number of people who will get into programs and tuition and university education becoming quite unaffordable for the greatest number of people.

We don't want that to happen, Madam Chair. What we want is for people to be able to get into postsecondary education because that's really what is the key to a better life. A university or a postsecondary education or a college education is the key to achieving the kind of sustainable, great jobs that people want. I hope the pages here take note that you need to continue on with your education; you need to go to postsecondary because that's the key to a life that you can enjoy and afford down the road. But the UCP is making it quite unaffordable for these pages and others in the near future.

Chair's Ruling Referring to Employees of the Legislature

The Chair: Hon. member, there have been instances in this House where employees of the Legislature have been used in our debates, for or against, those types of things. It's not helpful for the tone of this House. I would ask you to refrain from doing that in the future.

Debate Continued

Member Ceci: I was just pointing out the cost of university or postsecondary education. But I do want to say that one other factor in this bill that's going to make it harder to get into university – and it relates to tuition and the amendment that we're recommending – is the change to the family benefits that is happening in Bill 20. What we'll see . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt you again, but we are on amendment A5.

Member Ceci: Yes.

The Chair: When we are not on amendment A5, you can speak to other parts of the bill.

Member Ceci: Okay.

The Chair: Please proceed.

Member Ceci: With regard to the expensiveness, the UCP's directions in this bill will result in fewer people getting into postsecondary education. Of course, we want to ensure that everybody has the means to get into university, and with this bill they won't.

With our amendment, which says that "after consultation of not less than 6 months with public post-secondary institutions, and their affected faculties and students," that is a much better way of gaining a more complete understanding of the negative impact that this bill will have on postsecondary institutions.

When I went through postsecondary, it was affordable because not only were there loans and grants but there was my own work in the summer. I could put that all together and get through the four years of my first degree and the three years of my second, a postgraduate degree.

The fact that it's going to be tougher and that we are moving forward quickly with regard to it in terms of Bill 20 is something that all of us should take into consideration, that should give us pause, because really, in trying to find out if there is a negative impact, the people who are the experts are the affected faculties and students. And there hasn't been a great deal of consultation. As you can see, the students aren't even included in the bill's original motion with regard to this area, that we are trying to make sure does not happen. The students really are the masters of understanding the impact on their lives with regard to the changes that Bill 20 is bringing forward, and they're not even considered, Madam Chair.

This current government has taken drastic and fast action, and it's in a shock-and-awe kind of perspective, that they're going to change as much as they can as quickly as they can, and we'll figure it out when we get to figure it out. Well, I'm saying that that is not the way that you make good public policy; the way that you make good public policy is by taking the impact of what is going on before you change things, taking the potential impact of the changes and their effect on people before you make the changes.

Now, we haven't done everything perfectly on this side; we have taken some knocks in that regard, so I guess I'm sharing this information as a person who has not done everything perfectly but is trying to change positively as I go forward. Of course, I think that our former Advanced Education minister and his argument around the presentation of and support of this amendment to Bill 20 is what I'd like to see taking place and what we hope that members on the other side will agree with.

Of course, the cost of a university education: I'll just go back to that for a second, something that – societies who have great educational systems try and make sure that their system is affordable. Now, in the United States we know, with the recent controversy there about people trying to get into specific universities and not doing things properly, that they're trying to buy their way into those universities. That's not something we ever want to see in this country, in this province. We want it to be affordable for all people who choose to go to university. Unfortunately, there's too much in this bill that makes life unaffordable for Albertans who are wanting to undertake that.

Madam Chair, I'm going to sit down, but I hope members on the other side consider this motion and support it with all their might. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Mr. Stephan: Thank you, Madam Chair. Before coming into the Legislature, I always was taught that you're supposed to speak less, be as concise as possible, and it's kind of a different environment sometimes, where it seems that sometimes we hear a lot and not very much.

I want to just speak against, of course, the amendment at issue here. I appreciate the spirit in which it is intended. The member opposite said that he wasn't perfect, and I heartily agree that the entire members opposite were not perfect, and Albertans had that same sentiment. But, you know, we are not perfect also.

The principle of consultation. I just want to share with the members opposite and all members in this House that, in fact, consultation in respect of advanced education is a continuous process. Indeed, this morning I had the opportunity to meet with our Advanced Education minister, central Alberta MLAs, and the president of Red Deer College to talk about how they will go forward and be innovative in terms of making sure that we deliver education in an economic, sustainable way that is focused on market outcomes. So consultation is something that has happened, is happening, and will continue to happen. As government we always seek to try and be the best that we can be.

You know, we talk about the red tape bill that we passed. In my mind, the important message underlying the red tape bill is that we are going to look for continuous improvement. We want to change the culture of government and in all areas seek to be better. Of course, that includes advanced education.

I'm speaking as well because education is something that I hold dearly personally. I'm so grateful for the opportunity that I had to receive an intentional education, and I use the word "intentional" purposefully. As we're able to provide students, the rising generation of Albertans, with opportunities where they can be intentional in the choices that they make to receive a high-quality education, they will have the opportunities to be self-reliant and seek happiness as they individually see fit.

But it's really important that we understand that the status quo is unacceptable. We know from the MacKinnon report that we are the most expensive jurisdiction in terms of educating our youth without better outcomes. Indeed, as mentioned, we have declining enrolment. Unfortunately, I see the former Advanced Education minister sitting across the floor there, and we had the opportunity in Public Accounts to review the results of the Advanced Education ministry. Unfortunately, it really reinforces what the MacKinnon report said essentially, that we spend more. Even over the past years under the tenure of the prior government we spent more, and unfortunately our results were less.

I think one of the most concerning statistics that came out in the annual report of Advanced Education . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but according to Standing Order 4(3) the committee will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 20. I wish to table all copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. So carried.

Mr. McIver: Madam Speaker, it is 3 minutes until 12. I thank all hon. members from all sides of the House for their debate today and their contribution to the business of the House, but I think we have completed as much as we can at this point. I will move that the House adjourns until 1:30 p.m. today.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, before we adjourn the House today, I would like to invite all of you to a Christmas carolling, nonpartisan style, in the lobby today. If you have an instrument please bring that. Otherwise, just bring your voice. We'd be happy to have you.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:56 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, December 4, 2019

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Hon. members, please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have two school groups visiting us this afternoon. From Drayton Valley-Devon please welcome students from H.W. Pickup school, and from Edmonton-Decore welcome students from St. Francis of Assisi Catholic elementary. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Hon. members, this afternoon I have somewhat of a bittersweet introduction to make. In the Speaker's gallery are two long-time LAO employees who are both due to retire in January 2020. Committee Clerk Karen Sawchuk has been with the LAO since 2001 and has clerked 20 different committees. We are so grateful to Karen for her service and dedication to our members and our province. Please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Bills and Journals Clerk Judy Bressmer started with the LAO in 2000, and for 20 years she has served in room 315, and for some 40 years she has been a public servant. I like to call her the original J.B., and during my time as both a staff member and member of caucus I have come to be able to know the absolute joy that it is to be able to work with Judy. Certainly, if we have interactions with House business, we will miss you next session. The place just isn't going to be the same without you. Thank you so much for your service not only to members and to Albertans but to the principles of democracy and freedom. Judy Bressmer, please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. [Standing ovation]

Also in the galleries are some hard-working constituency assistants from Airdrie-Cochrane – Mikayla Houghton and Carole Vallet – as well as, from Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, Sharon Lencewich. Thank you so much for all you do in making our constituency offices run so well.

In the gallery this afternoon as guests of the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women: representatives of the Muslim Association of Canada.

Today I'm also very, very pleased to welcome some very, very, very close family friends, some might say best friends, but that I'll leave to somebody else to determine. Please welcome Kealy Dube and Ethan Dube Estrada, friends of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, you can continue. It's okay. We have a number of introductions, and some of them are yours. Go ahead as well if you'd like to take your seats.

Also, a guest of the Minister of Children's Services: a constituent of Calgary-Shaw, Darren Moroz.

Also, here for today's international Human Rights Day are Earl Choldin, Bernadette Iahtail, and Prabhjot Punnia, guests of Edmonton-Ellerslie; from Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood Maria Dunn and Leif Gregerson as well as April Eve Wiber; from Edmonton-Rutherford Joseph Luri and Michelle Nieviadomy; and from Edmonton-Meadows Miriam Thomas and Thomas and Marla Palakkamanil.

Almost last today is a very, very special guest as well of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, Benjamin Hauck and his family. They are visiting from the constituency. Benjamin is quite the artist. He actually won the art contest in the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora in order to be featured on the member's Christmas cards.

Members, if we could welcome those guests to the Assembly, I would greatly appreciate that.

Hon. members, we also have a virtual introduction of sorts. I understand that today the Member for Calgary-Klein's son is currently live streaming the Assembly with his grade 6 class at St. Marguerite school. Hello, Patrick. Daddy loves you.

Alberta MLA Awards

The Speaker: Hon. members, all hon. members will know that this week I put out a call for the first-ever annual Alberta MLA awards. I'm most pleased during these introductions to introduce to you, through me, all of those who have been voted as winners of the categories by you, the Members of the Legislative Assembly.

Please rise as I call your name, and I'd kindly ask everyone to hold their applause until we have read out all of the winners: the most collegial MLA, the Member for West Yellowhead; the best debater, the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland; best community outreach, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood; Alberta's most knowledgeable parliamentarian, the hon. Member for Airdrie-East; Alberta's best representative of constituents, the hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler; Alberta's hardest working MLA, the Member for Grande Prairie; the most promising newcomer, the MLA for Calgary-North East. The MLA lifetime achievement award goes to the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West. Lastly, congratulations to Alberta's MLA of the year as voted by your colleagues, the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Hon. members, your MLAs of 2019.

Members' Statements

30th Legislature, First Session, Accomplishments

Mr. Loewen:

'Twas just weeks before Christmas, and the province throughout,

People were positive, with no reason to doubt.

The UCP government implemented their plan, Passing bills promised in the platform they ran.

374 commitments were on the platform, 148 under way, and we're just getting warm.

The NDP and their media have voiced their despair, Claiming we're working so hard, it just isn't fair.

First bill up was to remove the failed carbon tax, Which will help the economy improve right to the max.

Next on the list was a job-creation tax cut To get our economy out of the rut.

Open for business act had a strong business case, Things like restoring democracy in the workplace.

Bill 6, to the joy of our ag sector, we did nix And replaced it with a well-consulted Bill 26.

In education we did maintain the spend. In health care we added $200 million in the end.

Quadruple apprenticeship spots, job skills careers, Creating opportunities that were in arrears.

With red tape we have worked on reduction
In order to increase corporate and municipality production.

Now indigenous opportunities, now fairness to newcomers,
Now elected Senators, too;

On ministers, on backbenchers,
And our fantastic staff, too;

To the top of the Canadian economy,
To the top of public services.

Now the Legislature session has dashed away fall,
So let's dash away, dash away, dash away, all.

But not before we talk about a few
More of the promises made to you.

150 million more dollars to fight the addictions wave,
To help with mental health, with lives to save.

When we found appointed Senators did not represent,
We knew the process for Senate; elections were meant.

We promised a war room, so we could fight back Against foreign-funded radicals, who are on the attack.

These things I have listed, named just a few,
We've accomplished with strong work from the UCP crew.

The ministers, it seems, have never slept
As each day we announce: promise made, promise kept.

Now as we go into the Christmas season,
We must remember Christ is the reason.

Giving hope and light to Albertans at this time,
Merry Christmas to all who have enjoyed this fine rhyme.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Human Rights

Member Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On December 10 we mark Human Rights Day and the 71st anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights, a milestone document that proclaimed the inalienable rights which everyone is inherently entitled to as a human being. A Canadian, John Peters Humphrey, as the first director of the United Nations' division of human rights, prepared the preliminary draft of the universal declaration of human rights for the executive group that was chaired by Eleanor Roosevelt. Mr. Humphrey spent the rest of his life working for human rights in Canada and around the world.

Today I invite all members of this Assembly to join with me in celebrating the progress made in advancing human rights. While we have made much progress, there is still much more work to do. We must stand up every day for human rights, starting with our own actions. We must respect our differences and stand together against those who promote hate and those who seek to divide us.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues know, I was born in Chile at the dawn of the dictatorship, a regime that saw the torture and killing of thousands of opponents and the thwarting of human rights complaints against its security forces. Unfortunately, Chile is once again going through the same thing. Although my parents brought me to Canada when I was very young, it is this background that helped to form my early understanding of the need for all of us to speak about human rights.

I call upon all members of this House to recognize our global reputation as defenders of human rights and commit ourselves to standing up for human rights every day, in Canada and around the world.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-North.

Human Rights

Mr. Yaseen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today in recognition of Human Rights Day, which is celebrated annually across the world on December 10. This celebration holds great significance because it was on this date in 1948 that the United Nations' General Assembly adopted the universal declaration of human rights. This declaration highlights the absolute rights that every person is entitled to as a human being, without discrimination. This year the theme for Human Rights Day is Youth Standing Up for Human Rights. Young people should be empowered as they play an important part in this positive change.

I also rise in appreciation of fundamental human rights that we as Albertans and Canadians enjoy and cherish here every day in this country. We are a country that respects the importance of freedom of assembly to allow people to voice their discontent. For many people here, the concept of having our fundamental rights disrespected is incomprehensible. We in Canada cherish freedom of speech, freedom of movement, freedom of religion. However, in many parts of the world, like Kashmir, Hong Kong, Iran, Syria, Cuba, and Venezuela, human rights have been reportedly violated. There are people fighting every day for their most basic rights to be respected.

The simple fact is that when humanity's values are disregarded, we are all at risk. We have seen this play out many times throughout history. We must work together to ensure that these rights are protected for all. Our shared humanity is rooted in these universal human values. We celebrate the world's success in moving forward on human rights for all, but we must remember those who are still fighting or even died standing up for their rights.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Violence against Women

Member Irwin: December 6, 1989: 30 years ago the lives of 14 women were taken at l'école Polytechnique in Montreal. They were murdered by a man who hated women, a man determined to kill feminists. Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne-Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Klucznik-Widajewicz, Maryse Laganière, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèle Richard, Annie St-Arneault, et Annie Turcotte: we remember them.

We remember the countless women who have lost their lives to violence before and since then. We know that women continue to face high rates of violence. Every six days in Canada a woman is killed by a current or former intimate partner. Alberta has one of the highest rates of domestic violence in the country, and the severity of the violence is on the rise. We know that the rates of violence against trans and nonbinary individuals and two-spirit people remain dangerously high. Indigenous women are assaulted almost three times more often than nonindigenous women in Canada.

Today we remember those killed at l'école Polytechnique and all those who are victims of violence. Today we must also reflect on the changes we need in order to make sure this violence doesn't continue. We stand together in remembering lives lost and fighting for a better future for women and gender-diverse folks.

We must stand with more than just words. This means investing in our communities. This means education: consent education, violence prevention, and more. This means demanding more from our legislators, from all of us, from those who might minimize violence against women. Let's not just say that we'll be better; let's do better.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Cochrane.

Big Hill Haven Women's Shelter in Cochrane

Mr. Guthrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On any given night in Canada 3,500 women and their children sleep in shelters because it's not safe at home. Often women in turbulent relationships are so fearful of reprisal from their abuser that it may take months or years before they can build up enough courage to leave. When an abusive partner discovers that their victim is seeking support or threatening to leave, the abuse can and most often does increase. Half of all young women who were victims of domestic violence homicide in Canada were murdered by somebody with a prior conviction, that was most often for a violent offence. I'm proud to be part of a government that recently passed Bill 17, which emulates Clare's law, to help prevent domestic violence in Alberta.

Addressing domestic violence is not an individual pursuit. In my constituency the women at Big Hill Haven Women's Shelter have been working tirelessly to provide housing, counselling, and crisis support for women in our area. Big Hill Haven was founded in 2016 to address the lack of safe shelters and resources for women fleeing or living with domestic abuse. Those serving at Big Hill Haven have directly assisted more than 150 women escaping abusive relationships. They receive six calls per day from people looking for help, guidance, or support. Mr. Speaker, I truly admire the work being done at Big Hill Haven. It is an essential resource in my community for women and children suffering in isolation.

Right now Big Hill Haven is partnering with various organizations to open up opportunities for community-based housing in advance of building a permanent shelter. I encourage our community to reach out and help raise awareness for the invaluable work that they do.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Education Funding

Ms Ganley: Sir Thomas More:

For if you suffer your people to be ill educated, and their manners . . . corrupted from their infancy, and then punish them for those crimes to which their first education disposed them, what else is to be concluded from this, but that you first make thieves and then punish them?

Cutting funding to education does not save money. This UCP Education minister's cuts will hurt children, hurt communities, and hurt the bottom line. The evidence is overwhelming that money spent on education, on mental health, on housing, and on social supports generally pays us back in savings in the justice system. The cuts the Education minister is making today will cost far more than she saves. She will save $10 today that we know will cost $1,000 in the future.

You want to talk about debt? What about the human potential this Education minister is wasting? What about those who only needed a little support to learn to read when they were six and could have gone on to be contributing members of society instead of spending their lives in and out of jail? This is a debt we will all carry.

Even worse, they talk about performance-based funding. It means that students who come to school hungry get less. It means that students who can't focus because of violence in their home get less. Most of all, it means that those who are the most vulnerable, those students who are at the greatest risk of feeling like they have no path forward to success, will receive less. Those who have witnessed or been victimized by crime, who are vulnerable to gangs just waiting to take advantage will not receive support.

Cuts to education hurt. They hurt people, they hurt society, and they do hurt the bottom line.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has the call.

Economic Indicators

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last night Moody's downgraded Alberta's credit rating, and the Finance minister sprinted to a microphone to say that it was someone else's fault. To be clear, there isn't a word about our government in the Moody's report. What it does do is lay the responsibility for this downgrade squarely on this government's failure to diversify the economy or to get our energy sector moving and on the revenue pressure created by the $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. Will this Premier accept the fact that his $4.7 billion corporate handout is hurting Alberta?

Mr. Kenney: There is no such thing, Mr. Speaker. However, RBC Economics said about this year's budget, "At last, Alberta has a credible plan at hand to make significant inroads [on fiscal balance]." Professor Tombe said: this is a gradual path – it is not an austerity budget – with reasonable economic assumptions that are conservative, and the spending restraint they have built in to balance by 2022-23 is entirely credible. CIBC Capital Markets said, "In our opinion, [the] budget which confirms an accelerated path to balance . . . moves Alberta further along an improving credit track." That's what they said.

Ms Notley: Yet while the oil price remains stable, the credit rating went down.

Moody's says that Alberta's economy remains concentrated and dependent on nonrenewable resources. That's another way of saying that Alberta needs to diversify its economy. Everyone knows this except the Finance minister. He goes on to say that diversification is a long-term luxury. I've got news for this Premier and his Finance minister. It is not a luxury; it's a necessity. Why can't they understand that?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, I've got news for the NDP leader. She left this province in a recession, with a jobs crisis and a fiscal crisis.

The National Bank financial markets said about this budget: "There is a new and serious plan to restore the province to fiscal health. It's a deficit reduction plan focused on spending restraint." Laurentian Bank said, "The bottom line for bond investors is that the UCP government can restore Alberta's . . . finances." The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce said: "[It is] a clear path back to balanced budgets . . . [It's] needed to avoid burdening future generations with unmanageable debt."

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, what this government did was increase the deficit by $2 billion. Bottom line: these guys promised Albertans jobs and economic growth, but the economy is in trouble, and jobs are disappearing. After almost a century Halliburton will close its cementing operations in Alberta. That means significant job losses across the province. These layoffs have to be reported to the government. I'll ask the Premier: how many Albertans have lost their jobs at Halliburton? Or is he just too embarrassed to say because, in fact, he's failing to deliver on his promise to Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, we're all concerned for those workers. The truth is that Halliburton laid off far more people in Texas today.

Mr. Speaker, it is outrageous for the NDP leader to talk about an increase in the deficit this year of $2 billion. Every penny of that is attributable to their reckless crude-by-rail contracts of over $4 billion, signed during the formal election period and then booked in this fiscal year for this government to take responsibility for their fiscal irresponsibility, in addition to the structural deficit, in addition to raising our debt from $13 billion to $65 billion. That's the fiscal disaster they left us with.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition has a second set of questions.

Ms Notley: Sooner or later this Premier is going to have to take responsibility for his own actions.

Health Care Funding

Ms Notley: Now, yesterday he tried to lecture the House, budget documents in hand. To be clear, we've read them, too, Mr. Speaker. The Health budget grows by just under 1 per cent this year while inflation plus population will be more than 3 per cent. Next year it's much worse, just a $6 million bump at the same time that the Premier will find $30 million for a secret campaign slush fund, also known as the war room. If the Premier could only be sincere. I know he understands that he's cutting health care in real terms. Why not be honest about it with Albertans?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more honest than the numbers. Last year's Health operating budget was $20.409 billion; this year, $20.610 billion. The Health budget continues to go up, not down. Now, this is after a 15 per cent increase in recent years. This is by far the largest health care budget in Canada. It is 30 per cent higher than the Canadian average on an age-adjusted basis, yet we have higher infant mortality and lower life expectancy. It's not acceptable. We need to work to find efficiencies.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Premier stood in this House with a bald-faced claim that the government is not laying off thousands of people, but that's exactly what the AHS letters say: for LPNs, 400 jobs gone; for RNs, 560 jobs gone; for support workers, 2,650 jobs gone; lab workers, 850 jobs gone; and consideration of much more to come. The Premier knows this. How can he be so disrespectful to the people he's sacking and the Albertans who need them by denying it?

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, what is disrespectful is misleading and creating fear amongst workers as the NDP leader is doing. The letter is very clear. It is a statutory obligation to indicate the total maximum number of . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Mr. Kenney: . . . positions that could – the letter uses the word “could” – be affected, and those positions, I hope, are not affected if the unions come to the table in a spirit of compromise to find reasonable savings. But, Mr. Speaker, if positions are affected, it will be disproportionately through attrition and not layoffs. As well, people will find other positions through contracting out provisions to the private sector.

The Speaker: Hon. members, a point of order is noted at 1:57.

Ms Notley: These brutal cuts are just the beginning, and the letters sent by AHS make that very plain, notwithstanding the Premier's desire to lawyer up. Bed closures, facility closures, relocation of services, reducing and ceasing of services: all of this is in black and white, words on paper. It's a dangerous path to American-style health care. This is not what the Premier ran on. It is a bait and switch. If the Premier thinks I'm wrong, will he stop running away from debate and defend his position with facts rather than name-calling and half-truths? [interjections]

Mr. Kenney: Mr. Speaker, (a) we are debating right now, (b) who specializes in name-calling in this place? The same NDP that's heckling me right now, because they're still so angry seven months later, angry with Albertans for firing them because of their jobs crisis, because of their fiscal crisis, because they increased health spending but got longer wait times. They made us pay more for less. Those are some of the reasons they were fired. We're going to do everything we can to get Alberta out of the hole that the NDP dug us into. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has a question.

Rural Police Service

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today marks a historic tax grab being downloaded onto the people of Alberta. The Premier and his Minister of Justice are celebrating an additional 300 police officers being added to combat rural crime, but this provincial government is not contributing one single dollar. Instead, they are downloading $200 million onto municipalities, who are already looking at cuts. To the Premier: will you admit that it's actually property tax payers who will foot the bill for more police?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, we're proud of the historic partnership that we launched today, the largest investment in rural policing since the march west. It's not lost on me that the members opposite have ignored rural crime. We offered to get all the members opposite on a bus to come down to hear about rural crime. They missed the bus. They've missed the bus on rural crime for four years. They continue to miss the bus on rural crime.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. No doubt this government is out spinning this as a historic day for the Premier and the minister. I support adding police, and so does this opposition caucus. What I don't support is massive tax hikes on Albertans already struggling because this government hasn't created one single job. To the Premier: have you determined how much more Albertans will pay in property taxes for these added police?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, it is laughable that they say that they support more police on the other end. They had four years to act on rural crime and did not do anything material on the file. [interjections] This is the largest investment, a new partnership, a seat at the table for rural municipalities to make sure they have their voice heard, their concerns heard. Policing is at its best when local representatives have their voice at the table. That's what we did here. This is historic. We should be proud of this instead of heckling it.

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, we did make a commitment and support police in combatting rural crime. The difference is that we put our money where our mouths are. We invested in rural police. We didn't give $4.7 billion away to already profitable corporations and then ask Albertans to pay out of pocket to keep their communities safe, and we didn't have the audacity to take other people's money and claim that we were making an investment. To the Premier: is hiking taxes for Alberta families really something to celebrate?

Mr. Schweitzer: Mr. Speaker, I am so proud of the work that our colleagues on this side of the aisle have done on this matter. We had the president of the RMA, the president of the AUMA at our announcement today. This is truly a partnership where we've listened to Albertans. We have listened to the rural municipalities to find a new path forward that's sustainable. The members opposite put their heads in the sand for four years on rural crime, not this side of the aisle. Rural Albertans know they have a true voice now in government to make sure that their concerns are addressed, to help keep them safe in their communities. They had ignored it for four years, not this side of the aisle.

Community Grant Programs

Ms Goehring: This government's terrible budget will cut funding right from the heart of Alberta communities. They have decided to slash the community initiatives fund by nearly $57 million. They have also cut the community facility enhancement program by $13 million. These programs help community groups across the province run community-building events, after school programs, and maintain and upgrade facilities. We have a few leaders from those community leagues here with us in the gallery today. To the minister of culture: can you explain to them and all Albertans why you're gutting funding for community groups to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate giveaway?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our ministry has funded $11.3 million in projects to date. Just over 170 community projects have been funded, including $95,000, actually, to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, to the Christian Life Center, that hosts a ton of not-for-profits. In this age of fiscal crisis and with civil society onside, I'm quite certain that we are going to be able to continue to fund and grow competency within the communities.

Thank you.

Ms Goehring: Cuts to these programs will have a devastating and lasting impact on how neighbourhoods thrive within our city and our province: that's not me speaking, Mr. Speaker, but a representative from the Edmonton Federation of Community Leagues that joined us today to speak out about these horrendous cuts. To the minister: do you really want to be remembered for devastating community leagues here in Edmonton and right across the province?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Actually, what I don't want to be remembered as is a government that spent $5 million a day on debt servicing, something that that government did. Another thing

I don't want to be remembered for is $2 billion in stranded assets in our energy industry that is now on the taxpayer. Another thing I don't want to be remembered for is not actually being able to build in our communities. We will continue to invest in communities on this side. Those dollars will be stretched, and we will make sure we're investing. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. It's important for the Speaker to be able to hear the answer to the question as well as the question.

Ms Goehring: Greg Lane from the McCauley Community League said that the cut to CFEP and uncertainty around this government moving the provincial lottery fund into general revenue may, quote, spell the end of our existence. Mr. Lane, who is with us here today, scheduled a meeting with the minister months ago to discuss the changes to these funds, and the minister ultimately stood up Mr. Lane, cancelling the day of. To the Minister of Community and Social Services and the minister of culture: will you agree to meet with Mr. Lane and the other guests today after question period to address their concerns about the changes to these funds?

Mrs. Aheer: Mr. Speaker, I'm going to just give a little bit of advice based on the fiasco last week that happened. Before you do a press conference and before you go in front of the media with these questions, potentially the member could actually bring forward her questions here. If she has a legitimate question for me, I'm happy to answer it. As always, our doors are always open. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. The hon. minister of culture is answering the question.

An Hon. Member: She's not.

The Speaker: Order. You might not like the answer, but she is answering.

Mrs. Aheer: As I was saying with my advice, before they decide to go down this absolute fiasco of misinformation, there are many, many opportunities to ask. We will continue to fund. We are invested in communities. Albertans put us here to do that, and we will continue to invest. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Official Opposition will come to order while the Speaker is on his feet.

The hon. the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland has the call.

Energy Industry Investment in Alberta

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta has been struggling to combat low oil prices and limited takeaway capacity. It's been devastating to watch Alberta struggle when less than a decade ago the industry was booming. Investors now see Alberta as a high-cost, high-regulation market. As a direct result, the world's largest and most experienced energy companies are pulling out of Alberta. Since 2015 investment has fallen by 61.3 per cent in the oil and gas sector. Our government has made a number of announcements to attract overall investment to Alberta, to signal that Alberta is once again open for business. Can the Minister of Energy please share any progress that's been made in Alberta's energy to attract new investment?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you to the member for his question. Just today Canadian Natural released their 2020 budget, their capital plan for 2020, and let me tell you that it's good news. They're planning on spending an additional $250 million next year. Let me tell you what that means, Mr. Speaker. It means an addition of 60 new drilling rigs. It means additional rigs, and most importantly it means about 1,000 new jobs in Alberta. This isn't a coincidence. It isn't luck or chance; it's due to our government actions to bring back investment. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for her answer. Given that it is crucial for the government to implement policies that encourage investment in our economy and given that Alberta is a world leader in energy and environmental protection, that would make the world better off with more Albertan and Canadian energy, and given that our energy sector has a key role to play on the world stage as a supplier of oil given that we have the third-highest proven oil reserves in the world, can the minister share any particular actions made by the government that led to the increased investment of CNRL? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Like I said, it isn't coincidence or luck or chance. Let me read you a direct quote from CNRL today: due to the government's recently announced elimination of curtailment for certain conventional drilling in Alberta and its previously announced reduction in income tax rates, CN has increased its 2020 capital budget by approximately $250 million over 2019 levels. Our plan is working. We're making progress. While the NDP scorched Alberta's economy with their socialist . . .

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland.

Mr. Getson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for her answer. Given that CNRL is only one announcement that has recently occurred given the depth of Alberta's energy sector, with various forms of energy being produced, and given that we've got a long way to go in attracting more energy companies to return to Alberta, where they were, and given that other companies, like CNRL, have taken note of the work done here to restore investor confidence in Alberta's economy, can the minister provide examples of other recent investments in Alberta that have taken place? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order. I almost had a difficult time hearing the question, which I know is a surprise because I almost never have a problem hearing the question.

The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the NDP scorched our economy with their socialist agenda over the last four years, we're doing what we can to bring back that investment, and it's working. Just earlier this week Suncor sanctioned the Forty Mile wind power project in southern Alberta, a capital spend of $300 million. BHE Canada announced its $200 million Rattlesnake Ridge wind project. Greengate Power is investing an additional $500 million in a solar project; Perimeter power, $200 million in a solar project; and Suncor, $1.4 billion in a cogen project.

The Speaker: The hon. the Member for Calgary-McCall is rising.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government ran on the promise of affordability for the people of Alberta. Page 36 of the UCP platform was even titled Affordable Electricity for Alberta Consumers. The NDP capped the electricity price at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour, a cap this UCP government just lifted, meaning that many Albertans will see electricity prices go up. Can the Minister of Energy please enlighten this House as to how removing this cap creates more affordable electricity for Albertans, or was there a typo in the UCP platform?

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, it's pretty rich for the NDP to talk about affordability of electricity. You know what each and every Albertan sees on their power bill every single month? It's the Balancing Pool adjustment, and it's a charge to each and every consumer to pay for the NDP's multibillion-dollar fiasco and ideological meddling in the power sector. Their meddling cost over $1.8 billion, and every consumer in Alberta is paying for it every month on their bill.

Mr. Sabir: Given that this minister's action will cause electricity bills in Edmonton to rise by 3.9 per cent this month alone and given that that announcement was made with little fanfare or notice, as is now common when the UCP government tries to slip in policies they know will make life more expensive, why won't the Minister of Energy tell us who she consulted with before deciding to hike electricity prices for all Albertans, or is this just to pay for their $4.7 billion corporate giveaway?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The 6.8-cent rate cap was something that the NDP brought in to hide the volatility of their movement towards a capacity market. We cancelled that transition based on extensive consultation with generators, producers, consumer groups, distributors. It was a very, very clear decision and a very easy decision to move back to the energy-only market, and it's working, because as you heard me say earlier, we have attracted more than $1 billion of new renewable electricity to this province under that new market.

Mr. Sabir: Given that our government was looking out for Alberta consumers when we introduced the cap on electricity prices and introduced stability into the system and given that this minister made the shocking claim that her decision to hike electricity bills came in part at the request of consumers, is the Minister of Energy really claiming that consumers were telling her that they wanted to pay higher electricity bills while big corporations get a massive $4.7 billion handout? How can she make that claim with a straight face?

Mrs. Savage: Mr. Speaker, what was running up the cost of electricity in this province is the NDP's ideological meddling in the electricity sector. [interjections] The jeers and heckling from that side won't fix the mess that they made in our electricity sector. Not only did they cause a $1.8 billion loss to the Balancing Pool, but then they sued the same producers that returned the power contracts. That led to a huge lack of investment certainty. We're cleaning up the mess they made.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Early Learning and Child Care Centres

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The three-year early learning child care pilot program will end in just a few months for 22 child care centres across Alberta. Many of these centres have made repeated requests to Children's Services and the minister for any information about whether the program will be extended. They've told me that all they've heard back is radio silence from the minister. To the Minister of Children's Services on behalf of these 22 child care centres – I'm asking you to respond with a straightforward, yes-or-no answer – will you be extending the ELCC program for these centres beyond March?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've said a number of times in this House, the terms of the pilot have not changed since they were introduced by the former government. The first 22 centres: that pilot is scheduled to end at the end of March. We are currently waiting for the data on the pilot project. We have heard from child care providers and parents across the board, some who are in the pilot program, but many across the province have expressed that this program is not working for them. It does not track need, income, wait-list, or employment. We will be working with those 22 centres in the new year.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that the minister continues to not provide a straightforward answer, these centres have no choice but to assume that there will be no more support from this government, and given that these centres have to make budget decisions now about what fees to charge parents, what to pay staff, and, in the case of at least some centres I've spoken to, whether they will even be able to stay open, to the minister. Your government was quick to hand out a $4.7 billion no-jobs, credit-downgrade handout to corporations. Why can't you be as quick to tell these centres, their staff, and families about whether you will support affordable child care for all Albertans?

Ms Schulz: As the member opposite knows, Mr. Speaker, affordability in child care means a number of different things, and every province across this country did different things with the federal grant to address the child care needs of parents in each respective province. What I won't do is commit money we don't have to programs we can't afford, programs that Albertans didn't vote for, like Quebec-style daycare, in the last election, in April. I have committed to be transparent with these child care providers as we make decisions as to what the next steps are going to be. That will likely be in the new year.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that one of the key aspects of the ELCC program is not just affordability but early childhood learning to prepare kids for school and identification of developmental and other needs and given that the minister has dismissed universal affordable child care as, quote, ideological and given that the minister has criticized the program because it didn't track income of families, indicating that she doesn't even understand what universal child care means or the program, to the minister: why don't you just come clean and admit that you've already made up your mind to put an end to affordable, accessible, and quality child care because it's more important to you to increase profits for corporations?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, as I've said, the fact that the pilot didn't measure employment or need or wait-lists are things that I heard from Albertans. Once again, the members opposite are completely out of touch with what Albertans have to say. I also want to be clear that the vast majority of these child care centres in the pilot were operational long before this pilot ever came into place. We are going to continue to focus on affordable, high-quality child care that meets the demands of parents and children across this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein is the only one with the call.

Aquatic Invasive Species

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My son Patrick's love is water. He and I love to camp and enjoy the lakes across this province. Knowing his uncle's shared love for our lakes, the minister is no doubt aware of the invasive species of quagga, zebra mussels, and Asian carp and their threat to our lakes across the prairies. In fact, it was only last year that millions of zebra mussel shells washed up on the shores of Lake Winnipeg. To the minister: what is your department doing to combat this invasive species from taking hold of our lakes and waterways here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, aquatic invasive species, particularly zebra mussels, are a very big danger to our province, both to our waterways and our diversity, but also to our agriculture and infrastructure across the province. That's why we've invested $7.2 million in this budget year into fisheries management, including aquatic invasive species. We have checkpoints all across the border, with the Environment and Parks staff working diligently to keep zebra mussels out of the province. I know, most importantly, that what my nephew Patrick likes the most are our sniffer dogs working for the environment department, who are our top dogs on the front line to protect us from zebra mussels.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the minister for the answer. Given that residents in Calgary-Klein also enjoy the many beautiful lakes across this province and given the need to preserve that natural resource for future generations and given that mussels aren't the only issue that our lakes and waterways are dealing with and given that invasive flowering rush crowds out our native plants and has the potential to fill an entire lake if left uncontrolled and given that it has already been established locally in waterways such as Lake Isle, not far from here, Minister, what is the government doing to combat this very real threat to our province's water bodies.

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Environment and Parks.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is correct. Mussels are not the only invasive species that we're concerned about inside our province. Flowering rush is a major concern for the province, particularly at Lake Isle currently. It's a complicated situation that's taking place up in that area. We're working closely with the First Nation communities as well as the municipalities in that area, ultimately looking for a solution where we can continue to deal with the epidemic that's taking place in that lake but also protect our waterways across the province from it spreading.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Jeremy Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for your hard work. Given that the minister has also made a promise to take his nephew fishing and given that we also have an issue with invasive fish such as Asian carp, koi, and other pet store fish like goldfish and given that just a few years back the city of St. Albert removed over two tonnes of fish from various stormwater facilities in local lakes, posing an immediate threat to ecosystems like the Sturgeon River, to the minister: what is this government's plan to combat this issue before rivers such as the Sturgeon are adversely affected?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, thanks to the hon. member for the question. Aquatic invasive species of all types are a danger to our waterways, including carp and goldfish and other types of aquarium pet fish that are inside this province. That's why we support the Don't Let It Loose campaign across the province, encouraging people not to let any pet fish, either live or dead, be released inside our water systems, and we continue education programs north to south, east to west when it comes to that important issue to be able to protect our waterways, both for recreational fishing but, as well, as mentioned earlier, to protect our important infrastructure when it comes to agriculture.

The Speaker: I'd encourage Patrick to ask some more questions around the Christmas dinner table.

For now, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora has the call.

Education System and Financing

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the weekend at the UCP AGM the governing party voted for a dangerous education voucher model that will cut even more money from our public schools than this government already has. The Minister of Education wouldn't speak in this House when I asked her where she stood on vouchers, but elsewhere she's told parents and trustees that she won't proceed regardless of the AGM vote. To the Premier: will you confirm in this place that the UCP government will not bring in a voucher-style education model to Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'm happy to respond to this question on behalf of the Minister of Education. Our party campaigned on supporting and protecting Alberta's long-standing, successful tradition of school choice. Our 2019 election platform was based in large part on the policies passed by UCP members at the 2018 founding AGM, which included support for the status quo. Students attending independent schools continue to be funded at 70 per cent of the base instruction rate that public and separate school students are funded at, and the minister has been extremely transparent that we are consulting on a new funding formula moving forward.

Ms Hoffman: Given that that sounds like a no, given that the resolution from Lacombe-Ponoka said that graduating students are "unemployable and increasingly radicalized by extremist ideologies," and given that yesterday's PISA results showed that Alberta students did exceptionally again this year, ranking eighth highest in the world for math and third highest in the world for science and reading, will the Premier please correct the record for the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka, your party, and all Albertans who have been misled by your government and take 35 seconds to express confidence in Alberta students and our public education system?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to the PISA results, the minister did speak very publicly about this yesterday. While we welcome Alberta's climb in global rankings, the increase is a result of a global downward trend. Our government respects the hard work that educators do every single day across our province to prepare students for their assessments, to succeed in their classes and for their futures, but we can and we absolutely will do better. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Ms Hoffman: Given that the Minister of Education and now the minister for children have continued to undermine public education through deep cuts, dismantling a long-overdue curriculum update, and saying that teachers are, quote, only in it for themselves and given that it seems clear that this minister has wilfully led an attack on public education, will the Premier take the holiday time to reflect and come back to this House ready to fight for kids, make the Education minister come back to this House fighting for kids, or consider who should actually be at the cabinet table? It seems like right now all she is doing is what she is told, not doing what the pin on her chest says.

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, our Education minister is doing incredible work on behalf of students across this province. When it comes to the funding formula, the Minister of Education has been incredibly clear and transparent throughout the process. We have maintained education funding at $8.223 billion, the exact same amount that was in last year's budget, but we can and will do better. The previous government left us in a fiscal disaster. We have kept our campaign commitment to maintain education funding because ensuring that teachers are with students in the classrooms is the most important thing we can have. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Housing for Vulnerable Albertans

Member Irwin: Today the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters released their 2019 data report. Sadly, the numbers are bleak. Every six days in Canada a woman is killed by a current or former intimate partner. Alberta's rates of domestic violence are the highest in the country, and the severity of the violence is increasing. Over 10,000 women, children, and seniors were sheltered in 2018-19, and over 23,000 women and children requesting shelter were turned away due to a lack of capacity. To the minister of status of women. This is a crisis. What are you doing to address it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Culture, Multiculturalism and Status of Women.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. I also read the report. As I've said before, sometimes the most important information that you can get is not always the best information that shows us exactly what we need to do to move forward. I'm very honoured to work with a government that has seen increases in funding to shelters and also to be able to work with our stakeholders very closely to find out what those needs are.

Thank you very much for the question.

Member Irwin: Given that a lack of shelter spaces means that more and more vulnerable women and children are put in very precarious situations and given that we know that women fleeing domestic abuse often face the difficult choice between homelessness and returning to their abuser and given that this is particularly an issue in certain communities like Grande Prairie, where a lack of affordable housing means that many women have had to return home, where it's unsafe, to the Minister of Community and Social Services: have you spoken to women fleeing violence, and will you commit to funding more affordable housing?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, I have undertaken extensive stakeholder engagement, both with victims of domestic violence and those who are experiencing homelessness, and what I can say is that our government is very pleased that we're able to maintain funding for women's shelters, and we're doing our level best to make sure that vulnerable Albertans are cared for.

Member Irwin: Given that research suggests that as many as 30 per cent of youth experiencing homelessness identify as LGBTQ2S-plus, often fleeing violent and unsafe home situations, and given that this is something that our government was so proud to make progress on – yet we learned in estimates that this government is not committing to funding, with the Minister of CSS saying that at this point there's no new investment allocated to that – to that minister. We know that without funding, many queer and trans youth are at risk. Why have you cut this funding, and will you commit in the House today to restoring it?

Mrs. Sawhney: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I absolutely disagree with the notion that we have cut any funding. My ministry has received the greatest amount of funding. In fact, our ministry's funding increased by 7.6 per cent. We are working with our community-based organizations to make sure that we're looking at the problems around homelessness, and we're doing our level best to ensure that those who are experiencing these issues are being cared for.

Market Access for Oil and Gas

Mr. Long: Mr. Speaker, our government campaigned on getting serious about the Trans Mountain pipeline expansion approval as Alberta needs the right economic conditions to attract investment back into our energy sector. There has been uncertainty for far too long, particularly around the construction of the Trans Mountain pipeline. But that uncertainty ends now. To the Minister of Energy. Proud energy workers in my constituency of West Yellowhead are grateful for your hard work that resulted in getting shovels in the ground on this project. Can you give an update on the progress of TMX and when we can expect to see completion?

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you to the member for that question. In fact, just yesterday I myself alongside the Member for Lac Ste. Anne-Parkland attended an event marking the commencement of construction of the Trans Mountain pipeline. I can report that the pipe is strung along the ground, along the right-of-way. The earth has been moved. Trenches have been dug, and the president of the Trans Mountain pipeline said that pipe will be in the ground and will be welded within the month. Mr. Speaker, the president said that the project will be built in 30 to 36 months, and we expect the federal government to make sure that that is brought across the finish line. We're looking forward to the completion of this important project.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. Given the lack of market access resulting in severe bottlenecks for our energy sector and given that many of my constituents rely on this industry to feed their families and given that we know that a strong energy sector makes for a strong Alberta, can the minister please elaborate on how the government will increase market access in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Education – of environment.

An Hon. Member: One of the three Es.

Mr. Shandro: Close enough. Hansard will fix it.

Mrs. Savage: Close enough.

Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We need TMX, and we need it to be completed on time. We also need the Enbridge line 3 project to be completed in the United States. It's been completed in Canada, and we're pleased to have heard earlier this week that it's now in service on the Canadian portion. We need these projects to move ahead. We need them to move ahead on time so that we can increase the capacity to move the growing production in Alberta. We're taking steps to reverse the last four years, which has a record of pipeline cancellations, vetoes, and delays.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Long: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Minister. Given that the minister was able to overcome obstacles at almost every turn that had the opportunity to further jeopardize the stability of our already fragile energy market and given that when they were in government, the members opposite actually hired anti-oil activists like Tzeporah Berman to help create obstacles, to the minister. Although significant, Trans Mountain is just one, sole pipeline project. How will this government continue to ensure that more projects like TMX are brought forward?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Energy.

Mrs. Savage: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. With positive news and momentum for both Trans Mountain and Enbridge line 3 this week, it's been a good week for pipelines. But we know we need to continue to ensure that these projects can be built in the future. That's why we're talking about Bill C-69 and Bill C-48 and the need to either have those pieces of legislation repealed or seriously changed, that's why I've met with my federal counterpart not once but twice, and that's why we're taking a group to Ottawa with the Premier next week to talk about the issues important to Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning has the call.

UCP Nomination and Leadership Contests

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At their annual general meeting this past weekend the UCP had a chance to stand up against their leader's rejecting accountability in Bill 22 when they were presented with a motion that read, "the UCP shall provide for fair and impartial nomination election contests and leadership vote processes." Shockingly, this motion was defeated. I guess fair elections just aren't the way with this Premier. To the Minister of Justice: now that your boss's undemocratic actions have been endorsed by your party members, which level of accountability will you be firing next?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I'm so proud to be a member of the United Conservative Party, that is being led by a Premier who for the entire time that he's been a leader has been dedicated to an open nomination process. That's a contrast with the party that's across the way, that doesn't believe in democracy inside their party process. That's their business, though. How our party runs our party is our business. We trust members to pick the nomination candidates for their constituencies. We will always be committed to an open and fair transparent nomination process, the complete opposite of the . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the rationale for this policy the UCP rejected was that “if . . . leadership campaigns are biased, or appear to be biased, the credibility of these democratic processes in the eyes of the party members and the public will be undermined” and given that surely by now the credibility of the current UCP leader’s campaign has been undermined, to the minister: will you support the call by Democracy Watch! to expand the RCMP investigation to include the firing of the Election Commissioner, similar to the call they made into Trudeau and SNC-Lavalin?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Bill 22 has nothing to do with anything associated with criminal investigations and/or the RCMP. All it does is take the election process to be brought under the Chief Electoral Officer so one office maintains all investigations. That officer, an independent officer of this Legislature, has confirmed that is the case. Through you to Democracy Watch! what I would ask them is: what are their feelings on the opposition party calling on the Lieutenant Governor to do something that would be completely undemocratic and overturn a decision of the elected body of this House? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Government House Leader still doesn’t want to be open and transparent about who the special prosecutor is and given – I will try this again – that the minister himself may have been a victim of the fraudulent practices surrounding this Premier’s leadership campaign but now given that he’s playing an integral role in removing all accountability for fair elections in the province, to the minister. It’s time to clear the air and be accountable. Who is the special prosecutor, and did you help to pick them?

Mr. Jason Nixon: Mr. Speaker, that’s pretty rich coming from the opposition. This side of the House has been very transparent. The Minister of Justice has already released a statement. I refer that hon. member to that in regard to the issue.

But that party’s leader admitted that two of her members, when she was Premier, were accused of serious sexual misconduct, that an investigation happened, confirming that two of those members were accused of sexual misconduct, and that she had to take action. She then hid that from Albertans. She hid that from Albertans, Mr. Speaker. So which ones of those members over on that side of the aisle are the people that resulted from that investigation finding out that they had conducted serious sexual misconduct? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Education Funding

Mr. Carson: Mr. Speaker, Edmonton-West Henday is home to many young families. Many children who live in the community attend public, Catholic, and francophone schools. These schools are both mature and new, and the students who study in them deserve to be in modern schools with reasonable class sizes and supports for students with special needs close to home. Why is the minister telling boards to lay off electricians, plumbers, and roofers to save teachers’ jobs when she is the one who is cutting their funding? Isn’t it the minister who should be responsible for restoring it?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children’s Services.

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for the question. As Budget 2019 was developed, we were unable to predict how insurance markets would adjust insurance premiums for school boards in this upcoming year. As a result of those rising premiums – and we have spoken a lot about this in the House – in a variety of different sectors, we are providing boards with the flexibility to repurpose the operating portion of their IMR grant to support classroom or school-based staffing costs.

Mr. Carson: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that it used to be illegal for school boards to increase school fees mid-year and given that the Education minister has changed the law and now families in Rocky View, Lethbridge, and Greater St. Albert Catholic have all been hit with school bus fee increases and given that I expect fees will soon rise for my constituents in Edmonton, too, will the Education minister give the constituents of Edmonton-West Henday any assurance that they won’t be the next ones to get saddled with the same mid-year burden that she has downloaded onto so many other Alberta families?

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Children’s Services.

Ms Schulz: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government has placed a significant priority on education and education funding, and that is why we maintained education funding at $8.223 billion, the same as last year. Let me say it again, please: $8.223 billion. We also, though, respect the local autonomy of school divisions to make decisions that best reflect their unique needs in their communities.

Mr. Carson: Well, given that a bill of more than $300 per child just before Christmas is a significant burden and given that with this government’s failure to create jobs, spur economic growth, or diversify, many families are still struggling and given that the $4.7 billion corporate handout from this Premier is a massive, massive failure, Mr. Speaker, will the minister and former head of the Catholic trustee association of Alberta explain to families why they should forgo Christmas presents for their children this year to pay for her failure to get them to school?

Ms Schulz: Mr. Speaker, once again – I don’t think I can be more clear – our Minister of Education has maintained education funding at the exact same levels as last year. The Minister of Education has been working incredibly hard with school divisions. We do have a fiscal disaster left to us by the previous government. We all have to look at ways that we can be more efficient with the dollars that we have to ensure that teachers are in the classrooms with students. But I can tell you that the minister has been very clear that, obviously, we respect the local autonomy of school divisions. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Natural Gas Industry Support

Mr. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government was elected on three main priorities: to get Albertans back to work, to make life better for Albertans, and to stand up for our province. An overwhelming majority of Albertans chose us to fulfill these promises, and we are proudly working hard to keep them. One sector that these priorities resonated with is our natural gas industry, which for far too long was neglected by previous governments. Jobs have been lost, companies have gone bankrupt, and our producers were left feeling isolated and ignored. To the Associate Minister of Natural Gas: what is this government doing to ensure that moving forward, our natural gas players have a say in how we revitalize this critical industry?

The Speaker: The hon. the Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My office has been implementing key recommendations from the Roadmap to Recovery for the benefit of the natural gas industry. We're committed to consulting with the industry. By the way, I don't mean the drive-by consultations that the NDP tried to do with the farmers. I mean real, meaningful consultations. That's why my office announced today a two-month engagement process where we're going to be reaching out to the entire value chain of natural gas producers. I have to stress that this will be the single largest consultation ever done. They have a lot to say, and we're going to listen.

Mr. Jones: Given that this government has already implemented several of the recommendations included in the Roadmap to Recovery report, which have had significant positive impacts on our natural gas sector, and given that many of these recommendations have included short-term actions that have successfully brought much-needed and immediate stability to our natural gas sector and given that our natural gas industry requires long-term, tangible changes that will address the systemic issues plaguing our natural gas industry, to the associate minister: can you please provide an example of a long-term action that this government is taking to continue growing our natural gas sector?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's imperative that we create a strong vision and brand for Alberta's natural gas. We need to do that because the NDP worked as hard on the natural gas file as they did on their shadow budget. [interjections] Look, there they go again. The NDP is heckling. They're going hysterical, and they're lighting their hair on fire. Why? Because they can't handle the truth. Well, let me tell you that the truth is that we're going to put Alberta natural gas back on the map. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Jones: Given that the former NDP government's refusal to acknowledge the dire state of our natural gas sector means that time is of the essence and given that the quick action of this government has already saved thousands of jobs and millions of dollars of investment and given that the natural gas sector as a whole still requires decisive and immediate action from this government to continue saving jobs, can the associate minister please tell this House when we can expect to hear about the results of this engagement? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The Associate Minister of Natural Gas.

Mr. Nally: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm looking forward to getting the results of these engagement sessions. It is absolutely imperative because the Leap Manifesto NDP and their Extinction Rebellion allies will not be happy until they've succeeded in shutting in every gas well. Well, that's not going to happen on our watch. We got elected on a campaign to stand up and fight on behalf of all Albertans. That includes oil and gas workers. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

In 30 seconds or less we will return to Members' Statements.

Carbon Pricing and Climate Change Strategy

Mr. Rutherford: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the greatest fallacies of the previous NDP government was a carbon tax, and now we have a looming federal carbon tax, but the NDP and the federal Liberals are not considering the implication of this regressive tax on products that are inelastic, a tax that punishes those who are unable to adjust, a tax that punishes families who buy gas to drive their kids to dance or soccer practice. There is only so much Albertans can do to avoid these increased costs in one of the largest and coldest countries on Earth.

The federal government has received a recommendation that in order to meet Paris targets, the carbon tax would need to rise to $200 or $300 a tonne. In an attempt to reduce emissions, the federal Liberals will increase the cost of products that hard-working Albertans use every day. After all, this is Canada. You will have to buy natural gas to heat your home no matter the price. Most Albertans do not have tens of thousands of dollars lying around to buy a more fuel-efficient car or to retrofit their homes as a way to mitigate these additional costs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I'm not advocating for inaction. However, we need to fight for the environment while also supporting our industry and a reduction in global emissions. As Albertans we believe in utilizing new technology and innovation. With our partners in the energy industry we need to be looking for a stronger symbiotic relationship with the environment. As an example, it would be great to see Asian markets utilizing natural gas over coal and for provinces in our own country to utilize waste treatment over dumping sewage into the rivers and oceans. We have the ability to solve these problems. However, protecting the environment is so much more than just carbon. There are countless facets that need to be considered. Albertans are world-class leaders in environmental stewardship, and it's time that the world caught up to us. We need to focus on exporting that expertise around the world. A local tax will not solve a global problem.

Thank you. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs has a statement.

Mental Health Awareness

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last night I learned that the gentleman who took his own life on Monday just outside of this Chamber, on the steps of the Legislature, suffered from depression and potentially PTSD. His name was Ken Chan. He was a retired military veteran, who served his country for 25 years. In a CBC news article the family advised that they hope that "by discussing the death [it] may be able to help someone else in crisis." PTSD and depression are real. Mental health is important, and we need to talk about it. The stigma around mental health needs to be addressed.

For myself this news has been deeply upsetting. This has really rocked me to my core. I'm very aware that I'm not doing well as a result of this news, and I am grateful that my colleagues have been checking in and asking how I'm doing. It's also important that we check in with our Legislature staff as this may affect everyone differently in their own time. I know for myself in the past I didn't feel that I wanted to let anyone know what I was going through. The stigma is to show that it's not bothering you. I didn't want to let others down by showing my vulnerability. But there is strength in showing vulnerability; that is how you get help. We need to come together and help each other and check in on one another. If you or someone you know is struggling, please reach out, and please call the mental health helpline at 1.877.303.2642.

I did not meet Ken Chan, but I'm deeply grateful for his service to this country, and I truly hope that he is at peace at this time. My heart goes out to the Chan family, the military community, and all of those who are touched by this devastating news.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Federal NDP Energy Policies

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, folks, "it's going to be a ring-a-ding-dong dandy." If you don't recognize that quote, it was made by the late, great Stampede Wrestling announcer Ed Whalen, who passed in 2001. Stampede Wrestling was an entertaining, staged weekly drama and a personal favourite of my grandfather Lesley Tennent. I think the entire province stopped on Saturday afternoons to watch the antics. I used the reality of Stampede Wrestling as a comparison to the NDP standing up for the Alberta oil and gas industry. While entertaining to watch the antics, we all knew that it was staged.

On September 24, 2019, Jagmeet Singh posted a reality check to Justin Trudeau on the NDP's website. It simply stated, "You. Bought. A. Pipeline." A simplistic and childish show of his true thoughts on oil and gas. To Mr. Singh a pipeline is shameful. Mr. Singh also said in an interview: I believe the federal government has significant constitutional powers, but I don't think it's effective to impose pipelines on communities; it's not the way to go ahead. Mr. Singh views pipelines as an imposition and not a way to bring jobs and economic success to the province and country. But I wouldn't expect anything else from the party that supports the Leap Manifesto or appoints anti-oil activists like Tzeporah Berman to the oil sands advisory group.

Now, with the obviously anti-oil, antipipeline sentiments of their leader Jagmeet Singh out in the open – and make no mistake; there's no difference between a provincial NDP and a federal NDP – it's time for our NDP opposition to pick a lane and stay in it. Stand up and denounce your party's stance on the pipelines. Stand up and denounce your party's Leap Manifesto and its ties to the tar sands campaign. Tear up your membership and sit as an independent, or do nothing and show Albertans what is really behind the orange curtain, just a bunch of anti-oil, anti-Alberta protestors, tar sands and Leap Manifesto activists. "In the meantime and in-between time," this NDP has just been "another edition of Stampede Wrestling." Thank you, Mr. Whalen, for your many, many years of entertainment.

Presenting Petitions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased today to table a petition. This is an additional 650 signatures from Albertans from across the province, which is in addition to the 1,700 signatures on a petition I filed earlier this session. The petition is "to urge the Government of Alberta to continue the Early Learning and Child Care program (also known as $25/day child care) at all participating child care centres beyond the 2020 or 2021 pilot project end date and to expand the ELCC program to more sites across Alberta."

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In accordance with section 20(1) of the Auditor General Act it is my pleasure as the chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices to table the following two reports from the office of the Auditor General, Alberta Community and Social Services: Income Support for Albertans; and Travel Alberta: Managing the Risks of Cloud Computing. Copies of these reports will also be provided to members.

Thank you very much, sir.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, followed by Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of my good friend the Minister of Energy I have five copies of written responses to questions asked at Committee of Supply on November 19, 2019.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. Number one is from the CorpEthics history on their website, by Michael Marks, where they actually brag about shutting down the Keystone XL pipeline.

My second is five copies of the tar sands campaign strategy that was written in 2008. It very clearly shows an attack on Alberta's oil and gas industry.

Ms Goehring: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to table the appropriate number of copies of over a hundred e-mails my office received about the changes to pensions that government introduced in Bill 22. These hard-working Albertans have contributed to these pensions with their own money. They're worried about the UCP government's recent changes to pensions, and they are very clear that they are telling the government: keep your hands off my pension.

The Speaker: Calgary-McCall, please.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of a report showing how most of the continent's bird species face high climate risk because of shifting climate conditions. I have the copies.

The Speaker: Are there others?

Mr. Sabir: I have another one.

The Speaker: Oh, correction. Continue.

Mr. Sabir: Another one is a copy of an e-mail from a concerned Albertan sent to the constituency office of Edmonton-Glenora, essentially sharing their concerns about how the cuts to education will impact their workplaces. I have the requisite number of copies.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, followed by Edmonton-Glenora.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table the requisite number of copies of e-mails from the constituents from Sherwood Park, from Calgary-Currie, and from Red Deer-North who have sent e-mails and who are concerned about this government's approach with private schools and vouchers and who are concerned about the deep and significant cuts to education.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, followed by St. Albert.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of letters here that have been sent to my office – some of them have been sent to other MLAs in the province; for example, a number here are from folks who live in Red Deer – who are deeply concerned about the attack on public education, a move towards a voucher model as endorsed by the governing party, and specifically one that I will mention who talks about being a 25-year cabinetmaker living in Red Deer, feeling that his profession isn't being respected by targeted education cuts.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert, followed by Calgary-Buffalo.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to table copies of the speech made December 2 by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in remarks to the 25th Conference of Parties to the United Nations Climate Change Convention in Madrid.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Member Ceci: Thank you. I have a letter from Ms Strychalski, titled Budget Cuts, to the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. Ms Strychalski is an educational assistant, and she's concerned that the cuts will make it far harder to teach children.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung, followed by Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table five copies of a letter from David Park, a former rap program firefighter, who warns the government of the negative consequences of eliminating the rap program firefighters. I have the requisite five copies to table.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, followed by Edmonton-Meadows.

Member Irwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings. The first tabling is a number of e-mails from folks all across the province who are quite concerned about this government's pension grab, particularly from a number of teachers.

The second tabling I have is from an educator who is quite concerned about all the cuts to education, and she's provided a very eloquent explanation of why she's so troubled.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows, followed by Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling the article by Dominic Rushe, We Are a Cautionary Tale: Kansas Feels the Pain of Massive Trump-style Tax Cuts.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Central Peace-Notley.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you for very much. I have several tablings here, Mr. Speaker. An article here from the Edmonton Sun titled UCP Rightfully Scaling Back the Public-sector Gravy Train, which shows that there are multiple opinions on what the government is doing here, not just the NDP version.

I have another article here from Calgary from the CBC, UCP Fiscal Plan Far From an Austerity Budget, Economist Says: Trevor Tombe Says Government Cuts Are Modest and Uphold Platform Promise To Balance Budget.

I also have one here from the National Post titled Trudeau and the Liberals Just Won't Stop Saying Things that Anger the West. It's an article that shows that we have our difficulties in dealing with Ottawa.

Another one here from the National Post, Some Good News for the West: You Have More Friends Out East than You Realize. It makes me realize that maybe we have more enemies here in Alberta, and they're probably sitting across the aisle from us right now.

An article here again from the National Post that says All Pain and No Gain: Alberta's Unpopular Carbon Tax Rises by 50% this Week, Fires Up Opposition. Obviously, this talks about the carbon tax that the members opposite love so much and want to have back, I guess.

I have another article from the Globe and Mail that says, Alberta Faces New Reality as NDP Raises Taxes. It says, "Alberta's [NDP] Finance Minister grudgingly admits it, and the province's opposition proclaims [that] the old Alberta Advantage is dead." That obviously goes back to the time when the previous Finance minister was at work in this province. I'm not sure what he was doing, but he was there anyways.

I have another article here from the Calgary Herald: Who Pays the Cost of Higher Corporate Taxes? If Companies Pass the Bill Down the Line It Could Mean Shrinking Paycheques, Higher Prices. Obviously, that's exactly what happened when the NDP raised taxes.

I have another article here from CFIB: CFIB Says NDP Needs Debate on the Alberta Economy. I guess this goes back to 2016. It says here: "When so many entrepreneurs are shedding jobs, and at serious risk of failure, that spells serious, fundamental trouble for Alberta. Obviously . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I would appreciate less commentary and more tabling if you have more.

Mr. Loewen: Just a couple left. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. From the Calgary Sun: Reigniting the Economy Requires Bold Action. Obviously, that's the action that this government has taken to bring the economy back to order here in Alberta.

One last one, Mr. Speaker: Advantage? What Advantage? [The NDP] Government's Policies Have Virtually Eliminated Alberta's Competitive Edge. It's from the Edmonton Sun.

Thank you very much. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members . . . [interjections] Order. Order.

Speaker's Ruling Tabling Documents

The Speaker: Hon. members, we're at tablings, and, well, we've seen a significant use of tablings by both sides of the House. I'm not sure this was the original intent of tablings. Nonetheless, we are where we are. Perhaps you were thinking of Judy Bressmer on her last day, with respect to ensuring that there was lots to be done.

The Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I'll move as Government House Leader, with my ability in the standing orders, to extend Routine to allow the Clerk to do the tablings that I'm sure she would like to do today.

The Speaker: Agreed.

Tabling Returns and Reports (continued)

Mr. Dreeschen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just have one tabling. It's from the Alberta Farmer Express, that was referenced earlier today when we were debating Bill 26. It's titled Alberta's New Farm Safety Act Gets Warm Response.

The Speaker: Exactly how you table a document. Is there anyone else?

Hon. members, I do have one tabling today. I have six copies of a revised report from the office of the Child and Youth Advocate.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mrs. Sawhney, Minister of Community and Social Services, responses to questions raised by Ms Renaud, the hon. Member for St. Albert, and Mr. Sabir, the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, November 16, 2019, Ministry of Community and Social Services 2019-20 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we are at points of order. At approximately 1:57 the hon. Opposition House Leader raised a point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise under 23(h), (i), (j). At the time, at 1:57, the Premier was responding to a question from the Leader of the Official Opposition where he, in his response, accused her of misleading. I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but I know that the Premier knows that that allegation against another member, as you've ruled in the past, is out of order. Now, I appreciate the fact that in about 15 seconds the Government House Leader will jump up and clarify that what he meant was something along the lines of: the opposition was misleading. I mean, I think it's important that members are aware of and pay special attention to the words and language that they use in this House, and from the fact that we know the hon. Premier has spent significant time in this House and in Ottawa, he should be a little more cautious with his words.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I was going to take a little swipe, but I will not.

The Speaker: Teamwork makes the dream work.
The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Anyways, I don't have the benefit of the Blues, so I don't know what was said, but what I will say is this. Clearly, the Premier was indicating . . .

Ms Hoffman: Sorry. Withdraw.

Mr. Jason Nixon: I know the former Deputy Premier and deputy leader of the NDP may want to rise on a point of order. Through you to her, I would suggest she waits for her turn.

I don't have the benefit of the Blues, but the Premier definitely was talking at length about the NDP misleading Albertans. However, he may have misspoken in the heat of the moment. If he did, I am happy to withdraw that comment on his behalf.

The Speaker: Thank you. I appreciate the . . .

Mr. Jason Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: Did you just call a point of order?

Mr. Jason Nixon: I can't call a point of order right now, but I will in a minute.

The Speaker: That is correct.

Well, I appreciate the withdrawal. In fact, you are correct. He did make a statement that said, "What is disrespectful is misleading and creating fear amongst workers as the NDP leader is doing." I appreciate the withdrawal.

Hon. members, I consider the matter dealt with and concluded. We are at Ordres du jour.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mrs. Pitt in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 20

Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Chair: We are on amendment A5 as moved by the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West. Are there any speakers to the amendment?

Seeing none, I will – the hon. Member for Edmonton-South.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's always a pleasure to rise and catch your eye, even at the most late of moments. My apologies. I wasn't quick enough to the draw there.

I think it's really important, when we look at this bill and we look at the amendment before us and look at how we want to move forward, that we consider very carefully and do think about how we talk to people – right? – that we talk to people and understand the issues and the impact that we're having on people.

Madam Chair, amendment A5 is very simple, I think. It's something that all governments should aspire to do. It's something that all governments should aspire to have in their repertoire, and that's the ability to actually talk to the people they're representing – right? – to actually have the conversations and understand the impacts that will be happening to the constituents.

When we look at the ministers that are sitting in our benches today and with us all the time, Madam Chair, they don't really seem to understand the impacts. Right? That seems to be the ongoing problem, that they don't understand the impacts of these changes. When they go in and they make these big, American-style, omnibus changes, with these big, American-style, omnibus bills, you have far-reaching impacts, and it affects every single sector of our economy. It affects every single family. That's something that's very concerning.

When you do this and you move quickly, as the government is trying to do with Bill 20, when they're trying to move so quickly in this omnibus style, it means that often there will be no understanding of how those impacts will affect individuals. There is no understanding. I believe it's important that when we talk about these enrolment targets, when we talk about how there are these goals for how many people should be in each class, we have this opportunity to consult with those institutions, with their faculties, with the students, especially with the students.

Madam Chair, we talk all the time in this House and the Conservatives in particular and the government in particular love to talk about how we're not here to choose winners and losers – that we're not here to choose winners and losers – but the government has then gone and given themselves the abilities in this bill to pick those winners and losers in postsecondary education, to pick the enrolment targets that they will have in postsecondary education, without any consideration to actually understanding what the needs of the industry will be, without any consideration or understanding of what the needs of the students and the faculties will be.

Madam Chair, I know that the minister wants to do the right thing here. He wants to be able to have the ability to have some dynamic targets here, but without any understanding, without any consideration, and without any consultation you can create very, very difficult situations. You can create situations where, for example, suddenly the competitive averages to enter some of these programs are way out of whack, can be rising by, let's say, 15 per cent or more or 20 per cent or more in some institutions. That can be very concerning.

I know that when I was entering university in my computing science program, that was a competitive program. Just over one year the competitive average changed 7 per cent, I believe, and that's even concerning. Students in, say, grade 11, in looking at what institutions they want to enter and where they want to enrol, want to have some stability. They want to understand how they need to apply and where they need to apply. But when the minister gives himself this unilateral authority to make significant changes without consulting, without understanding the needs of these students, and without understanding the needs of the institutions and the students, that's where you can see some very concerning changes moving forward. Right? That's where you can see some actions that will have negative outcomes, outcomes that the minister could not possibly foresee.

That's not a slight on the minister. The minister has the opportunity to foresee some of these problems, not all of them but some of them. The minister certainly is able to have that conversation if he would agree to consult, right? The minister, for whatever reason – and maybe it's direction from this Premier – doesn't want to consult. I know this government has spoken at length about how they move so quickly that there's no time for consultations and that consultations are for things that aren't important. That's what this government has said. That's what they said during the campaign. It's what they have said here in this House as well, that they want to move extremely quickly with their legislation.

But this is a perfect example of where they've gotten that wrong. They need to slow down. They need to talk to the universities, the postsecondary institutions, the colleges, the trade schools. They need to have those conversations that allow them to understand what is actually going on, that allow them to understand what is actually happening in these classrooms, that allow them to understand what is actually happening in terms of enrolment, and that allow them to understand what is actually happening in terms of students wanting to enter different programs, Madam Chair. That's really important. Postsecondary education is one of the greatest equalizers, right after primary education. Postsecondary education allows people to earn more over their lifetime, allows people to be more educated, allows people to have more opportunities to access different jobs.

We believe this is really, really important. We believe it's really, really important to support students being able to access what they want, being able to support students being able to enter the fields they want and to have the support they need in these programs. But when the minister decides to unilaterally not do any consultation and to make significant changes to how the enrolment targets will be made without talking to even the affected faculties and students and the public institutions, Madam Chair, that's what's problematic.

When the students aren't at the table and when the faculties aren't at the table, we know that these effects will not work for them, right? The minister would have done well to have listened to some of the students, to have them come and talk to him. I know that many of the organizations that represent students have been talking to the minister and talking to many MLAs in this Chamber, myself included, Madam Chair.

When these students come and talk to us, they speak again and again and again about how important it is to have a voice. But the minister, by rejecting this amendment – and I believe the minister will reject this amendment, and that's unfortunate – is telling students that they don't deserve a voice, that their voice is not important, that the needs of the people that are actually attending these institutions, paying their tuition, and trying to learn and give themselves a leg-up in life, Madam Chair, are not important. That's what this minister is telling them – right? – and that's something that's very disappointing. It's very unfortunate that we're seeing that, and it's very unfortunate that this is the precedent that this government is setting.

This government is showing that they are not in it for the working people, for the students, for the faculties. What they're in it for is their friends and donors who are part of their $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout. I think that's the type of conversation that we're having here. It's becoming abundantly clear that this minister does not care enough, in my opinion – he can rise and correct me at any opportunity. Clearly, he does not understand or does not care that the needs of the students need to be heard, the students and the people entering postsecondary institutions and the people that are going to be enrolled in postsecondary and trying to further their lives in some of the most formative years of young people's lives, with some of the opportunities for them to learn great skills in those years and stay and apply them here in Alberta. This minister does not think that those voices are important: the very people that we are trying to help, the very people we are trying to teach, the very people we are trying to engage and ensure have a strong path into postsecondary.

I think it's concerning. I think it's concerning when the minister doesn't seem to understand when we're talking about things like enrolment targets and we're talking about things like changing them and playing with the numbers, as it were, Madam Chair. But the minister needs to consider that it's not just about the numbers, right? It's about the people. It's not just about how we can fiddle a couple of percentage points over here or a couple of percentage points over there. It's actually about the people. It's actually about the students. Postsecondary institutions aren't a spreadsheet. Some of the administrators may think that they are, but indeed it actually is about trying to educate our students, have more learned people, and engage in things like research and development. Those are very important things. But at the core of it, at the core of what a university does, is that we bring people into universities and they come out with more information. They go in to learn. Those are the people that are the most affected by these changes.

When this minister chooses not to even consult with them, the people that our postsecondary institutions are there for, the students, when this minister says, "We don't need to consult with students; their opinion won't matter for us in this because we can set those enrolment targets and we can change what makeup they're in," that's very concerning. That's the type of thing that's very concerning. Those are the people – and perhaps the minister needs to be reminded – that it is his role to protect and to ensure have the best possible learning environment, have the best possible environment to grow and learn in, again, in some of the most formative years.

When we look at this omnibus bill, we look at the vast, sweeping changes that are being brought forward in this omnibus Bill 20. We look at this relatively simple amendment, amendment A5, that says:

well, maybe the minister, before moving so quickly forward, should actually just talk to people. Maybe he should actually understand what the changes that are going to be made will do. Maybe the minister should actually go in and listen to students, not just go in with a predetermined consultation that has a predetermined outcome, Madam Chair, but actually talk to those students and say: "What are your needs? What are your requirements? What do you want out of your education?" Those are the types of discussions where I think many students, whether they're in high school thinking about entering postsecondary or are already in postsecondary, whether that's a trade school or a college or a university, would have a lot to say to the minister. They'd have a lot to say about how they don't believe things like a 23 per cent tuition hike is valuable to them and that they don't believe their student loan rates should be going up 1 per cent, which, I believe, is over $7,000 over the life of an average student loan, Madam Chair.

While we've had these conversations, we've seen the government make significant changes without consultation already, but perhaps in this case, when we're talking about how people enter school, postsecondary, the minister would stop for one second and actually engage because that's the sign of good governance – right? – to represent the people that sent you here. Those students are among the people that sent us here, Madam Chair. Indeed, in his role as the Minister of Advanced Education, that is one of his largest stakeholders, the people that he is ostensibly trying to educate. I think that it's very important that we have these conversations. I think that it's very important that this legislation reflects that, that this amendment is put forward so that we can have the understanding that these students do deserve consultation.

Madam Chair, they deserve consultation. It's not a thing where the government should come in and just say: oh, these cute little student groups, we'll just listen to them for a couple of days. That's not what should be going on here. What should be going on is that they should have this right in legislation right here to have their voices heard at the table. They should have their voices heard, and people should understand because in any other industry and in any other field, when we make these types of changes, the ministers always talk about how they've gone in and talked to all these groups, talked to all these different organizations, talked to all these stakeholders. But the Minister of Advanced Education, being responsible for our postsecondary institutions, really has very few stakeholders: the postsecondary institutions themselves, of course; perhaps some of the industries that will have uptake from the students who graduate from the postsecondary institutions. Of course, the number one stakeholder for someone who's the Advanced Education Minister would be the people receiving the advanced education in our postsecondary institutes.

When the minister decides that "Well, I don't need to hear from those people; it's not very important for me, and it's not very important for our government to hear from those people, those students," that's concerning. It's concerning to me because it means that the minister, perhaps, does not really understand what the breadth of this job is supposed to be, right? The minister, perhaps, does not really understand that he should actually be trying to protect and engage those students, right? Those students are the ones that are going to be deciding what streams they want to enter, what programs they want to enter, what degree programs or diploma programs or trade programs they want to enter. Whatever it is, those types of changes are going to affect these young people for decades to come – right? – for really their whole lives. For young people that are entering postsecondary institutions now, whether it's college, trade school, or university, it's actually going to shape how they live and how they work for almost the rest of their lives, Madam Chair, and for most people the majority of their lives. Those are the types of conversations that we need to be having with these students, with young people, and talking about: what would be the best for you to be able to have a fulfilling life and a great work life?

Madam Chair, the minister, I think, perhaps doesn't understand that because this amendment is very simple. It says that maybe we should actually talk to those people and understand what their needs are and understand what their concerns are and understand why they may want or not want certain targets in certain ways and competitive averages that would change in certain ways, and what not. Of course, I think that it's important that we stand here and that we talk about these issues.

Again, I believe that the minister will vote this down, but when the minister votes against this, we will see very clearly that the people that the Advanced Education minister is tasked with educating, the students, are secondary to him, and that's extremely concerning. That's extremely concerning because it is contrary to what I believe his mandate should be, which is to ensure that those students are given the best possible opportunity to succeed in their lives and that they are given the best possible education so that they can have the most fulfilling lives that they can have.

I think that it's very interesting that we're seeing time and time again this Conservative government move, as they say, so quickly forward with this, without any consultation. I think it's very concerning and very telling that they're also willing to do things like give away $4.7 billion to the wealthiest corporations. They're also willing to do things like Americanize our health care and in this case, Madam Chair, actually, I think, Americanize our education and our postsecondary education in many ways, which I think many Canadians and Albertans would not like or do not like.

I think that's the type of thing that speaks to our values, right? I think over here on this side of the House we think it's important that we actually engage with our constituents. We think it's important that we actually talk to our constituents and understand what those needs are. We think it's important that we actually understand what impacts this will have on families. On that side of the House, Madam Chair, perhaps they're a little blinded by ideology. Perhaps they're a little bit blinded by this desire to push forward. But what's going to happen is that there are going to be real impacts on people, right? There are going to be real impacts on families. There are going to be real impacts on students. Those are the people who are going to suffer, right? Those are the people that are going to have worse lives, basically. It's actually really unfortunate.

I know some of the members opposite are laughing here and whatnot, Madam Chair, but the reality is that this is a decision that young people have to live with for the rest of their lives, right? The changes we make today are going to affect people of approximately my age, a little bit younger now, for the rest of their lives, right? That's something that is very, very concerning, that this government doesn't think it's important to have those conversations, doesn't think it's important to have those consultations, doesn't think it's important to actually hear from the people we're affecting.

That's why we're here as the opposition, Madam Chair. We're going to bring those voices here to ensure that the government hears because, I mean, it is their job to listen to what the opposition has to say. I know it's in their talking points now, their key message, that they will not be lectured by the opposition. Well, here's a news flash. They've been here for two sessions now, a spring and a fall sitting, so perhaps they should have figured it out, but if they haven't, that's actually their jobs. It's their jobs to be here and debate and listen to what we have to say.

If they choose not to and they put their earplugs in, that's their prerogative, Madam Chair. I don't think Albertans appreciate that. I don't think Albertans appreciate them basically holding an affront to democracy, but I think it's important that we have those conversations. I think it's important that we have these conversations because the people that are being affected have the opportunity right here in this amendment to have a better life, right? We have the opportunity to make this better for them. We have the opportunity to make this more stable for them and to have those consultations.

Perhaps the minister is right. If he wants to make a change and he wants to change the target 10 per cent and then perhaps all the students agree with him, that would be wonderful. But we will never know because the minister refuses to consult. The minister refuses to engage and refuses to have those consultations. That's the type of thing that's concerning. If the minister knew he was right and if the government members knew they were right and truly believed that what they are saying is the right thing to do and the right way to move forward, the government would not be afraid of consultation, right? It's really, really telling when the government is afraid of accepting an amendment that just says: let's do some consultation. Right? That's what's really telling. It's really telling that the government is afraid of actually having these conversations, is afraid of letting the opposition stand up on this, afraid of having students actually talk to the minister. When they're afraid of actually engaging with the public, Madam Chair, that's what's telling. It's telling because it means the government knows that they're going to make mistakes but don't want to own up to it. I think this is one of those mistakes, to not allow this engagement, not allow this consultation. I think this is one of those mistakes.

The government, again, will reject this amendment, I believe, Madam Chair, and what we'll see is that, basically, students will not have a voice and will never know if they made the right decision or not. Even if they did make the right decision, Albertans will never know because they didn't consult. They chose not to. They were too scared to, and that's a little bit disappointing.

I'd encourage all members to vote for this amendment. I guess that will soon be determined, Madam Chair. I look forward to hearing from the rest of my colleagues. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A5? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Nicolaides: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm just trying to figure out where to start, so many things said by the member opposite which are completely false and inaccurate and couldn't be further from the truth. So I just need a moment to try to wrap my head around – maybe I'll just point to the facts. I think that might be a good place to start. You know, we can just talk wildly off the top of our heads about things that could be and may be, but I would just like to talk about the facts.

You know, I encourage the member – maybe he hasn't had an opportunity – to actually look at the changes that are being proposed within the bill, particularly on page 64. I'm going to read it out just to provide some clarity. It says here very clearly in black and white: "The Minister, in consultation with public post-secondary institutions." So there's not a "may." There's not an "and." There's not an "if." It says there very clearly: "The Minister, in consultation."

So I don't understand. The member opposite has gone on a 20-minute tirade about consultation. It's quite interesting to talk about consultation. If I remember correctly, they were the ones who introduced a carbon tax without even telling Albertans about it, so it's interesting that they want to talk about consultation when their record and history on consultation is particularly challenging.

Madam Chair, it's right here in black and white: "The Minister, in consultation." Again, I'm struggling a little bit trying to wrap my head around how to begin. It's in there in black and white. The member opposite can see that.

I know the member opposite has also talked a little bit about the importance of engaging and consulting with students. That is the number one priority for me in my role, ensuring that I'm taking the time to engage and consult with our students. I've had a quick look at some of the numbers as the member was going on. By my count I think in the past seven months I've had over 25 individual meetings with student groups themselves, not to mention other meetings with faculty representatives, the institutional leaders. That comes down to just shy of four meetings a month with student groups and student leaders. You know, I'm a little confused as to why the member is going on about not consulting with students. I mean, it's in there in black and white, and the amount of times and opportunities that I've had to sit down and discuss and engage with our students. I'm really encouraged because our students really offered some very valuable and important ideas that have helped inform my decisions and government policy as we move forward. I know that that will continue. We'll continue to discuss with them and consult with them about the changes that we'd like to implement to help strengthen our postsecondary system.

You know, again, the member opposite goes on to say things like: you should actually just talk to people, get out there and talk to people. Well, Madam Chair, I have been, and I've had several individuals from the postsecondary world tell me that they've had more interactions with me in the past four months than they did with the former minister in four years. That's coming directly from members of the postsecondary community. The member may not want to take my word for it about actually sitting down and engaging and consulting with our stakeholders, but I'd encourage the member opposite to go and talk with them directly, to take his own advice and go and speak with members of our postsecondary community and ask them if I've been around and able to consult with them and discuss our ideas with them. I think he'll be pleasantly surprised. My approach is always one, I think as you know very clearly, of collaboration and consultation. That's the approach that I've taken and applied to everything that we've been doing in Advanced Education and will continue to implement.

You know, having a look at this amendment, I encourage members to not support this amendment. Again, it seems to be another trend that we see from members opposite. They want to provide a lot of very prescriptive rules around things, how consultations should occur and when and for how long and who. They want to take a very prescriptive approach. We've seen that. They've taken that approach with our postsecondary institutions and created unnecessary red tape and added unnecessary red tape onto our postsecondary institutions. The amount of conversations that I have with our postsecondary leaders who tell me they're wasting time, quite frankly, Madam Chair, filling in unnecessary reports, submitting information to government – it's our view, of course, and I know the Associate Minister of Red Tape Reduction would be quite pleased to hear that it's our approach to take a step back, reduce unnecessary red tape, and free up our institutions so that they can engage in the important work that they're doing in terms of strengthening their research agenda, exploring innovative and creative solutions to problems and challenges that our society faces. That's what they should be doing. That's what they should be spending their time on, not filling out silly reports for government. Under the former government that was the trend that we saw, additional reports and other requirements imposed on our institutions.

Perhaps I'll just wrap up there, Madam Chair, but I encourage the member opposite to have a look at the bill. It's black and white. It's quite clear: again, the minister "in consultation." It's not an "if." It's not an "and." It's not a "but." It's not "if the weather permits." It's not "if I feel up to it that day." The minister must consult.

Again, I think that the amount of engagement and consultation that I've had with our student leaders, who are – you know, the member is correct. They are the most important stakeholder when we talk about advanced education. We need to ensure that we're giving them the tools and the resources and the knowledge that they need to go out into the workforce and find rewarding and high-paying careers. That's been our focus, Madam Chair. That's our objective, to ensure that we're setting them up for success as much as possible in a changing environment and a changing economy. This element of the bill will give us more ability to do that, to help ensure that we're setting them up for success.

As it relates to the amendment, though, I think it's quite clear that I won't be supporting it. I encourage my colleagues to not support the amendment as well. I'm happy to continue our discussion, Madam Chair.

Thank you for the time.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A5?

Seeing none, we shall vote.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A5 lost]

[Motion on amendment A5 lost]

The Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak on the bill?
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. With this bill we actually see the elimination of a number of tax credits. This is one of the most concerning things because while we were in government, we actually heard from a lot of small and medium-sized businesses that providing these tax credit incentives was a good way of moving forward, specifically in terms of diversifying the economy. My experience on the doorsteps of Edmonton-

Ellerslie specifically but also in other parts of the province as I've helped other colleagues door-knock in other places as well: you often hear people, even people who identify as Conservatives themselves. You'll ask them, "Well, can we agree that we're too dependent on petroleum?" They say: "Of course, yes. We've been saying that for a very long time." I say to them, "Well, can we agree that we need to diversify the economy?" "Yes, of course, we definitely need to do that." I'm sure that the hon. members across the way can agree that, you know, putting all your eggs in one basket doesn't necessarily lead to very good economic planning as we continue to move forward as a province, move towards becoming more modern.

You know, some of the tax credits that were put in place by our then minister of economic development and trade were created specifically in order to create incentives to not only move us towards – for example, what our government started with was the petrochemicals diversification program, which was still connected to the petroleum industry but was making sure that we could add even more value to the product before we would sell it to other markets.

Also, we would move into newer technologies and not only new technologies but also move towards – for example, the Alberta screen-based production grant – being able to allow more flexibility. I specifically mention this one because there are actually constituents of mine that actually run Mosaic Entertainment. They're Eric and Camille. I have spoken about them in the House before, even when we were in government, because very early on Eric and Camille actually came to me from Mosaic. They asked me to take a tour of their business and not only of their business; they actually invited me on set one time of one of the movies that they were producing right here, invited me to, you know, a character home inside of Edmonton-Glenora, where they were actually filming the movie. It was a movie about – it was actually a remake of Roxanne but now using text messaging. I can't remember the exact name of the movie off the top of my head, but it was basically the story of Roxanne over again. It was great to see.

You know, what was so amazing to see was how many people were being put to work, because that production set – we're not even just talking about the actors. We're also talking about the technicians that were on set, the people that even were involved in the catering, of making sure that all the technicians and actors and everybody associated were being provided food on a daily basis, three meals a day. I'll never forget the pride on Camille and Eric's faces when they took me on a tour through that set. They felt so incredibly happy not only that they were being successful and contributing to the Alberta economy, but they were doing it in a way that they loved best because they were so dedicated to the film industry here in the province of Alberta.

I think that, at the end of the day, a lot of entrepreneurs are so invested in their business because they love what they're doing. They love what they're doing. They love to be able to contribute to the economy, so the more that we as a government – and I say that broadly, of course – can provide these tax incentives to our local entrepreneurs to help them reach their dreams, to solidify and make sure that their business continues to grow, the better. That's what these tax credits were created to do specifically for the entrepreneurs of Alberta. Now, it's a shame that this bill will actually terminate these tax credits, these incentives.

Instead, we end up getting from this government a $4.7 billion no-jobs – and now a credit downgrade – handout to corporations, where, yes, these corporations have taken this money, but they haven't even invested it here in our province. When I'm out on the doorsteps and when I'm out in the community and I'm talking to people and people ask me, “What’s this $4.7 billion no-jobs corporate handout?” they’re, like: “Okay. Like, we get it, because it’s a conservative, political, ideological approach to provide this incentive, but when these corporations aren’t even investing those dollars here in the province of Alberta and taxpayers have given this money over to the corporations, how does that make any sense?”

This is what we see from this government. We see a very highly ideologically motivated government that wants to put a conservative approach, their ideological conservative approach, into place at no matter what cost. As we’ve highlighted in other bills that have been before this House, the sacrifices that are being made now are made by the most marginalized in our society.

Specifically, Bill 20, with the cutting of these tax credits: in a way, it’s almost like we’re sawing the floor out from under these entrepreneurs that were expecting these incentives in order to contribute to our economy. As has been well stated – and my Conservative colleagues on the other side of the House and to my right over here also know it very well – small businesses employ many Albertans. So why wouldn’t we – why wouldn’t we? – encourage these entrepreneurs to continue working hard to build their businesses, their dreams? That’s what this is about. This is about them building their dreams because they love it, just like Eric and Camille with Mosaic Entertainment.

Not everybody is dedicated to one particular industry. There are so many other things that Albertans love to do. They want to contribute to the Alberta economy. It doesn’t just have to be in the petroleum industry and those service industries related to the petroleum industry. You know, I know that my Conservative colleagues on the other side know it just as well as I do, that when you invest your dollars, you’re not going to put them all into one stock. You’re not going to take all of your life’s savings, your RRSP and say: “You know what? I’m going to bet it all on this one stock, and I’m just going to hope this thing roars. I’m just going to sell high, and I’m going to make a whole lot of money.” You wouldn’t do that with your own RRSP, so what makes you think that we should do it with the Alberta economy? And by that I mean: put all of your eggs in one basket.

Why aren’t we working towards truly diversifying the Alberta economy, which is what these Alberta tax credits were created to do? The Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has said it so many times, gotten up in this House and spoken specifically about the number of entrepreneurs, businesses that actually took advantage of these tax credits and actually helped us move the needle on diversifying here within the province of Alberta.

Madam Chair, through you to all the members, I think that it’s imperative that we critically analyze these two approaches: the approach of providing these tax credits and making sure that we’re helping Alberta entrepreneurs continue to build their dreams and invest right here in the province of Alberta and this $4.7 billion no-jobs – and now a credit downgrade – handout to the corporations, that Alberta taxpayer dollars are being taken out of this economy and being invested in other jurisdictions not only across Canada but across North America.

There are so many aspects to this bill that we could go on and on and on. You know, the other one, that I have to say because members from my own communities in Edmonton-Ellerslie have talked about it, specifically people with the community leagues, is what’s being done with the Alberta lottery fund. We heard really well last night from the Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs. She spoke very eloquently and adamantly about how monies from the Alberta lottery fund are now being moved towards general revenue and that so many of the programs and things that community leagues do in terms of providing programming not only for young citizens but all citizens that live within the community league are now not going to be funded as well as they have been in the past, specifically those related to recreation.

These are all things that impact all the people in our society that I’ve spoken to already in terms of other bills. I think about programming that is offered to seniors. Again, I know that in the community of Knottwood, which actually used to be inside of Edmonton-Ellerslie but now has been moved over to Edmonton-Mill Woods with the last boundary change – I remember when I was first elected going over to Knottwood Community League, and they were providing yoga for stay-at-home moms and their children. You know, you may think to yourself: “Oh, well, okay. So we’re not going to provide yoga for stay-at-home moms and their children.” But, no, these are citizens of Alberta that actually need time. These stay-at-home moms need to get out and socialize with other stay-at-home moms or with other people. All this programming means so much to the people who actually access it.

A program that we may not see as very important: to a person who actually enjoys partaking in that particular piece of programming, well, it means a whole lot to them. Now we’re going to see a reduction in the amount of programming being provided to citizens because of the move of this government to take monies from the Alberta lottery fund and siphon that into general revenue.

There are so many things regarding Bill 20 where I could go on and on. My colleagues have gone on at great length about it as well, but the other one that is concerning – and, you know, even people in my constituency have brought it to my attention – is the cancelling of the city charters, a way of establishing new long-term funding between the provincial government and the municipal governments. I talked a little bit about that last night as well and about the relationship between municipalities and the provincial government. I think that with this move, with Bill 20 specifically, we’re seeing that municipalities are getting the short end of the stick. I think that it’s really important that we continue to work as effectively and as efficiently as possible with our municipalities because, at the end of the day, that’s where citizens access the most services, through their local government. I think it’s imperative that because we’re collecting these taxes from citizens, we pay specific attention to where citizens are accessing these services and in what context.

Again, Madam Chair, I want to thank you for the opportunity to be able to speak in the House today about Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, and just highlight once again that what I find devastating about this bill is that these tax credits are going to be cut. Perhaps some members may think it a bit dramatic, but with the cancelling of these tax credits, we’re actually inhibiting entrepreneurs from making their dreams come true in this province, from making our economy that much more diverse and more rich with the contribution of people like Eric and Camille, who are so dedicated to the entertainment industry. Perhaps these people, who so lovingly call Alberta their home, not having access to these tax credits will mean that they will leave Alberta because the same tax credits or very similar tax credits are being offered in other jurisdictions. You know, the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has spoken to that as well, the fact that there have been a number of companies here from the province of Alberta who see that those tax credits are being offered in other jurisdictions and decide to move their business elsewhere.

With that being said, Madam Chair, again I thank you for the opportunity, and I will leave it at that for now. Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 20 in Committee of the Whole? The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. I think, as a whole, that this bill will make things more expensive for all Albertans, for people living in my constituency. If I could talk specifically a little bit about my constituency of Calgary-McCall, it consists of three neighbourhoods and the airport area. Most of the people living in these neighbourhoods in my constituency are on average making less than anybody else in the city, and they are spending more on shelter, basic needs, in comparison to the rest of Calgary.

For instance, in Calgary the average spent on shelter costs is 22 per cent of the income of the household, but in Taradale, in comparison, 31 per cent of my constituents there pay more than 30 per cent of their income on shelter. Similarly, the average income for individuals in Calgary is $43,251, according to the most recent data that's available through the city of Calgary, while in Taradale it's only $28,807, way less than the Calgary average.

In Saddle Ridge the same thing: while 22 per cent of the households in Calgary spend more than 30 per cent of their income on shelter, in Saddle Ridge it's 30 per cent. And in comparison with Calgary's average income of $43,251, the average individual income is $30,493 in Saddle Ridge.

In Martindale 29 per cent of the households spend more than 30 per cent on shelter, in comparison with the Calgary average of 22 per cent. And their individual income is $29,538, in comparison to the Calgary average of $43,251.

As you can see from these numbers, people in my constituency have lower incomes, and they spend way more on shelter. There are many of them who are first-generation immigrants. They all moved here for a better life, for a better future for their kids. This budget certainly is not good news for them. This bill certainly is not good news for them. Through this bill they will all be paying more in income taxes through that tax creep thing. Like, their incomes are already low, and when you freeze the inflation on those brackets, many Albertans, including those in my riding, will end up paying more in taxes, every single one of them. While the province is downloading many things on the city, in these neighbourhoods and across this province people will end up paying more in property taxes as well. You can only blame Mayor Nenshi so far for everything that the province is doing.

This bill is also doing things that will result in investors moving their capital away from Calgary, away from our province. Money will be lost in film and television industry investments and jobs, which also were of particular interest for many in my riding. For those who are of South Asian descent, those film and television credits were certainly of interest to them. The tech sector: that's moving out of province, heading to Toronto. Fewer companies are investing in research and development and new inventions like tech and green-tech jobs.

Money is being diverted, through this bill, away from community organizations, the CIP and CFEP funds, that were utilized by many in our communities. The Member for Calgary-North and the Member for Calgary-Falconridge would know that there were many community-based organizations who were providing services, who were running important programs, based on community initiatives grants. Like, I can count many organizations just in my own constituency who have received CIP grants and have delivered services to many in our communities, valuable services.

Then there was the CFEP grant, that was also utilized by many community associations, community organizations in my constituency and across this province. We are seeing a huge reduction – a huge reduction – in CIP and CFEP grants, that will certainly impact Albertans across this province but particularly in my riding, which primarily consists of first-generation immigrants and people who are coming to Canada and calling Alberta home in recent years.

These were important supports they were getting from community organizations, and this budget clearly attacks those funds and is attacking our communities. In this budget money is diverted from community organizations. The lottery fund goes into general revenue, and although the government is assuring Albertans that, "Oh, it will be there," nobody wants to trust this government.

This Bill 20 is also putting projects like the green line and the west LRT in jeopardy in Calgary and Edmonton. Those were important projects for our cities and our province.

They're doing all that through this bill, which seeks to amend some 17 pieces of legislation, repeals five, adds two new. There is so much hidden in this bill, important things that will impact our communities and government.

When they were in opposition, they were always against omnibus legislation. What they used to call omnibus legislation was the kind of legislation that would have labour relations and workers' compensation together, completely related things. Here they have just lumped everything together. The only thing in common that you can find in all these pieces of legislation and all these changes proposed by this legislation is that it's taking things away from Albertans, it's off-loading things onto the municipalities, and it's off-loading things onto Albertans just to pay for their failed $4.7 billion handout.

When we look at the impact of that policy, we didn't see investment coming to our province, and we didn't see new jobs getting created in our province. Instead, we are seeing exactly the opposite. Under this government's watch we have lost 27,000 jobs. Under this government's watch we have seen investment fleeing out of our province. And it's not fear and smear. Husky, who received $233 million from this $4.7 billion handout, laid off 371 Albertans, they reduced their capital plan by $500 million, and they're investing in Wisconsin, Saskatchewan, and elsewhere in the United States. They're not investing here.

Because of this government's policies, investment is fleeing out of our province, and because of these policies, we are losing jobs every day. EnCana, who received $55 million from the $4.7 billion, is moving out of Canada altogether. They changed their name as well. Yesterday we heard about Halliburton, who was here for a hundred years. They also benefited from the $4.7 billion handout. They're moving out. And it's Albertans who are losing jobs, who are losing economic opportunities.

Yesterday there was a credit downgrade. When we were in government and there was a credit downgrade, they would blame it squarely . . .

Some Hon. Members: Six.

Mr. Sabir: Yeah. You got the first one in six months. You're on track to get more than six. You will get eight at this rate. If you got the first one in the first six months, you're on track for eight.

The interesting thing, Madam Chair, is that the first one – we don't celebrate that. But the first one is clearly telling them where they are getting it wrong. If any of you bothered to read Moody's report, it's very clear in that report that the $4.7 billion handout is the reason. It's very clearly stated there that the environmental risk that our economy is facing is a risk. But you have not done anything. Instead, you have repealed the environmental plan that Alberta had. That report is clearly saying that the execution of your fiscal policy is not realistic. It's subject to macroeconomic conditions that are not in your control. The price of oil is not in your control. There is still time. We can look at those things and take steps so that we don't see any other credit downgrades. But you're still insisting that your policy somehow will create jobs.

There are a couple of things I want to reference which are relevant to what this government is doing here in this province. The 2019 Nobel prize for economics went to economists who – one of them was Dr. Banerjee, from India – said that reducing taxes doesn't create jobs, that it doesn't create investments. Here is a group of economists who are telling us this. They're telling us this based on research, based on evidence. And here we have this government that still insists that, no, all of these economists are wrong.

The 2018 Nobel prize went to an economist who said that aside from the environment, from a business standpoint economies have to brace for environmental risks. They have to incorporate innovations. And what we are seeing here is no action on the environment. The credits we had for innovation, for diversification: from what we are seeing in Bill 20, they are being taken away. This bill is ending the interactive digital media tax credit. This bill is ending the capital investment tax credit, the community economic development tax credit, the Alberta investor tax credit, the scientific research and experimental development tax credit.

All these tax credits were put in place based on evidence, based on consultation. That's what Albertans were asking for. That's what entrepreneurs were asking for. These are the types of credits, these are the kinds of policies that have been tried by other provinces, that have been tried by other nations, and they do work. They attract investment. They attract jobs. They attract entrepreneurs. But this bill is taking away all of these credits.

That's exactly what's been pointed out by Moody's report as well, that Alberta needs to focus on diversification. All these tools that were helping us to diversify: this bill is eliminating all of that. If you won't listen to us – credit grades are important to you – listen to Moody's. That's what they are saying, that Alberta needs to diversify its economy. Taking away every tool that was helping us diversify is the complete opposite of what economists are saying, what these credit-rating agencies are saying.

It's also changing film and TV tax credit grants. They have been pretty much eliminated. In our neighbouring province of B.C. they are making way more through these industries, and how they do it is that they offer those incentives. They offer those programs that will help attract TV and film production. This bill is taking that away from us.

With respect to the tech sector I think that when we were in government, we focused on creating more tech spaces across postsecondary across this province.

Postsecondary education certainly makes a difference in people's lives. It makes a difference in the lives of cities, communities, and the economy of the province. What we are seeing through this bill, no matter how much this government denies it, is that they are ending personal tuition tax credits, reducing them for personal education tax credits. They're increasing tuition fees across this province, in some cases 5, 10, 20 per cent. When we were in government, we had a freeze for four years.

In this entire province the minister is the only person who has been told by students that they want to pay more. I never heard that from any student. There are many people in my constituency who go to university. They say that even with the freeze it's expensive. Last week there were students from Calgary, medical students. When I talked to them, none of them said that they requested the minister to remove the freeze and jack up their price because they wanted to pay more for their education. Not a single student I have met so far – and I will try over the holidays to meet some more students. Honestly, even if one of them tells me that they want to pay more for their education, I will come and report to the House with their name, address, everything. So far I haven't met a single student who wants to pay more.

Those tax credits and those grants: they were important. When I was going through university, these things were important to me, and these are important for students across this province.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. We're focused on Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. First of all, like I said about Bill 21, it sort of makes you wonder why the government in all of its efficiency and capacity would feel the need to craft yet another omnibus bill that shoves in everything but the kitchen sink. You know, I would ask the government members . . . [interjection] Well, the kitchen sink is in there, yeah.

But I would ask the government members, you know, because I'd be really curious to know: did everybody actually read the entire bill? I'm guessing that had they done that, it might have looked a little bit different. There are some pieces in here that will damage, big time, your communities. You might not think so now. You might think that your big mandate is so big that it can withstand anything, but I'm guessing it won't.

Anyway, I'm going to focus on one of the pieces that this government has seen fit to include in this omnibus bill. It is on page 55, and the heading is Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act. Right at the bottom of page 55 it says:

Disestablishment of Fund

11(1) The Environmental Protection and Enhancement Fund is disestablished.

That means it's gone. Now, this particular fund, of course, was under the environmental protection act.

4:30

It's important to know the legislation that this is changing or amending. Of course, I went and had a look at the environmental protection act, and one of the things that was quite interesting is about the fund that is contained right in the act. If you look at the act and you look at section 30(5) – I'm going to read you the header for subsection (5). It says:

The following shall be paid into the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Fund.

Then it lists a number of things, right? It begins with (a), and it goes all the way to (g), I believe. But here are the things that are in this particular fund:

- (a) security transferred under [another section];
- (b) money recovered by the Government in respect of the Government's carrying out work or taking emergency measures under this Act or any other enactment under the administration of the Minister;
- (c) money advanced by the Minister from the General Revenue . . .
- (d) money from a supply vote . . .

It goes on and talks about:

- (e) payments made by any person or the government of another jurisdiction for the purposes of the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Fund . . .

It goes on:

- (g) gifts, donations . . . transfers to the . . . Fund.

It goes on and on.

But then what was really interesting, if you scroll a little further and you go to subsection (11) – part of me was thinking: this is just another attempt of the government to take funds that were once administered by other oversight bodies, or there were other oversight bodies looking at it, and they're moving it into general revenue. So I was asking: why on earth would they take this small but important fund and just get rid of it altogether?

Well, here's subsection (11) in the environmental protection and enforcement act. Subsection (11) says:

If at any time it appears to the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance that there is money in the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Fund that is not required for the purposes of the Fund, the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Treasury Board, may transfer the money to the General Revenue Fund.

That's weird. Why would this fund be completely removed, "disestablished," which is an awkward word, just gotten rid of if the Finance minister and President of Treasury Board has the ability to do that anyway? Well, that's interesting.

Let's look at actually what this little fund did. It's not a particularly big fund, but there are components of this fund that are actually quite important. Components of the fund include forest fires; Flat Top Complex, which I actually didn't have time to look up; forest health; environment emergency response; intercept feeding and fencing. I don't see obvious cost savings to this particular measure, so once again I'm left asking questions, like we always do here, because we don't get answers. Why on earth would you put this in this piece of legislation, to remove the fund, to remove the work of this fund, to put it somewhere else that your ministers can deal with it without it ever seeing the light of day? Why would you do this? I really don't understand. I really wish somebody would stand up and explain not to me but to my constituents and to the other Albertans that are thinking: "What are you doing? Are you acting in the best interests of this province?" I would guess: you know, not really.

If you read the financial statements of this little fund, I think it sheds a whole lot more light on some of the activities that are captured in this piece of legislation or in this fund that falls under this act. I'm left asking: why on earth would you do this when you know – well, I would hope that you know – that any sort of activity or forward momentum or movement around climate change is essential? It's absolutely essential. But, then again, I wouldn't be surprised because when I hear the environment minister, Madam Chair, speak about climate change, it's usually followed by, "Yada, yada, yada, something climate change; we don't deny it, but the opposition doesn't like oil and gas," which is ridiculous to me. I don't get it.

It's like we have to do some loyalty test, which is ridiculous because we have always said the same thing: we are fortunate to have this resource. We need to do everything we can to get the best price for that resource, which is why our Premier at the time did everything that she could to get that pipeline done, and it's happening. [interjections] Well, I know you guys don't work well with reality. There's a lot of laughter. They're awake, which is good, I guess. They're laughing at the fact that the pipeline got done.

I'm sorry, Madam Chair, but it's my understanding that the current Premier – when he was a Member of Parliament and a minister in Ottawa, there was not a lot of movement on pipeline expansion. In fact, although the government likes to say, "You and your buddy Trudeau" – whatever; that's just silly. What happened is that that particular expansion had some problems because of the previous government. That was the Harper government, and that was the government that this current Premier was a part of. We can point fingers all we like. The fact is that it's getting done. The fact is that a lot of work was done over the last four years. Laugh all you like. You didn't magically get it done when you won your great big mandate. That's not how it works.

Let's go back to climate change.

An Hon. Member: Let's, please.

Ms Renaud: Yeah, let's.

Let's go back to climate change. I don't know if the members here understand what's going on right now. Did you know that . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, we're trying to keep some peace in this House, and there are a number of comments that are certainly walking that line. Could you please focus on the bill at hand in Committee of the Whole?

Ms Renaud: With all due respect, Madam Chair, if I could respond to that. I am referring to the piece of legislation that looks at the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act.

The Chair: Okay.

Ms Renaud: That is related to climate change, what I'm about to talk about.

The Chair: That's fine. Very relevant.

Ms Renaud: What I was trying to explain is that the development of oil and gas and expansion of the pipeline, which we believed was absolutely important to getting the best price for our resource while at the same time we addressed a climate crisis through a climate leadership plan: that's where I'm going.

The Chair: Thank you.

Ms Renaud: All right. What is happening right now, Madam Chair, is setting a standard or setting agreements between governments, between the private sector about what the future will look like for governments, for cities, for provinces all over the world. That's going on in Madrid right now. There is an international meeting that is going on where people are discussing this very important issue. Well, it's actually not an issue; I think it's the thing that will define our future. It began in 1992. I'm sure some of you will remember the United Nations framework convention on climate change. Now, of course, the focus was on reducing greenhouse gas emissions and other things. Actually, now it's expanded. Starting in 1992, that eventually led to – you know, the acronym is COP 21, which we all know as the Paris agreement. We are now at COP 25, and that's happening in Madrid. It actually had to be moved to Madrid because there was a natural disaster, climate change related.

Anyway, these are important things. I mean, these are really important things, and I would hope that as an Albertan I can know – all party politics aside, I would expect that my government, whether I belonged to that particular party or not, would stand up and recognize the emergency that we are in right now and talk to us as Albertans about what the plan is. Yes, we want to get our resources to market, to different markets. We want the best price we can possibly have. We know that we must transition carefully because we cannot destroy our economy while we're looking to diversify and looking at an energy transition. That's the reality. That is what countries all over the world are grappling with. That's what we have to be grappling with here, but we're not because we're having discussions about whether we can wear an "I love oil and gas" shirt in the gallery, Madam Chair.

Anyway, let's talk about climate change. There are three strategies currently being discussed in Madrid right now, and those are mitigation, adaptation, and finance. Now, I think that all three of these topics, Madam Chair, were really part of the focus of the legislation and part of the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act and the fund that was administered or talked about under that act, but that is gone. This piece of legislation, which includes all kinds of things, everything from environmental protection to benefits for children, doesn't make a lot of sense to me. I don't believe it's respectful of the members of this House, in the limited amount of time that we have to debate, to actually be able to properly research, speak to our constituents, and then debate this properly and respectfully. Parts of the pieces in here are incredibly important.

If you don't believe that the environment and the protection of our environment and the reduction of greenhouse gases and the mitigation of all of the things that are coming are important enough to be in their own piece of legislation and deserve their own focused debate, then I think you're missing a point. You're missing the point that over 11,000 scientists from around the world have been very clear about telling us that if we do not act now and live within our emission budget, which we are not living up to right now, not as a country and certainly not as a province, then we will continue to feel the impacts of climate change.

You don't have to look very far: in the last – I don't know – five or seven years some of the horrific tragedies that have happened in this province. I'm not talking in terms of money, the cost to Albertans. I think that the cost of the southern Alberta flood was absolutely devastating. It was absolutely devastating to the people of southern Alberta, and it was devastating to our economy. I think I read estimates of the cost of that particular natural disaster, the flooding in southern Alberta, as high as, like, $5 billion. I do think that that was a little too high, and I have read lower estimates. You know, we've got the fires. The Fort McMurray fire, which was absolutely horrific: the cost was over $3 billion, yet we're still seeing the human cost today. We still see the human cost, and I'm sure the members that represent those communities can attest to that, that people are still dealing with the stress of that particular event. I think that those of us that even saw pictures of it on television or online will never forget what that looked like.

You know, Madam Chair, not that long ago – it was actually just a few weeks ago. Actually, that was another California fire. If we look to the south, there are other areas of North America that are feeling more acute impacts of climate change, California being one of them. They have a couple of different issues. Of course, they're closer to water; they're close to the ocean. They've been dealing with an incredible amount of drought, as is Alberta. But if you look at the one fire – I think it happened last year – it essentially burned down the entire city of Paradise, California, absolutely burned the city down.

The reason that I'm bringing this up is because we're incredibly fortunate – incredibly fortunate – that the Fort McMurray fire was contained the way it was by the incredible, remarkable first responders that we have that fought those fires, that safely ushered people out of that city. Then, I might add, it was important to note that those leaders told us that we needed another exit out of that city, God forbid it ever happened again. The previous government: we did make that commitment to do that because that was important.

We also got the recommendation to deal with the operation centre. Those particular people who are on the front lines understand the weaknesses in the system we have because they've been tested in the last few years. They've been absolutely tested by climate change, whether it was the southern Alberta flood or the fires in northern Alberta. They understand that there's a problem.

Madam Chair, I'd like to give a little bit more information about why I believe it was not a great addition to an already huge bill, that covered so many areas that I think it's irresponsible. One of the areas: again, the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act. I might add: add this piece of legislation or this particular piece within the legislation to the fact that that particular budget, environment, has been cut drastically when now is the time that we should have been investing in it. Anyway, what that does is that it sends a signal, to me, to a lot of my constituents, that addressing climate change, climate emergency is not necessarily a priority for this government.

In early November I actually printed – and I tabled it not long after that – what was on the website of the government of Alberta, environment, just to get some information and just to get a copy of it before it was changed, if it was changed. It talks about climate change in Alberta. It's funny. I think that it's kind of interesting that when I do talk about climate change, climate emergency, you hear the levels go up, and you hear the comments, "You don't like oil and gas," or whatever the ridiculous things that people heckle.

What I would like to say is that the government of Alberta – that would be you – believes that climate change is a problem, and they actually go into great detail, Madam Chair, about the inherent risks of not addressing emissions, greenhouse gas emissions. If we do not bring these emissions down and meet our target, meet our emissions budget very, very quickly, these things will happen. This is very real. These are scientists and researchers and staff of the government of Alberta that have put this information together for us to use. Most of us are not scientists. These people are. This is based on research. This is fact. The impacts of climate change are very real.

Agriculture, one of the most important areas, absolutely important – and these are people, these are communities that will be impacted first, one of the first groups that I think will be impacted and very severely. I think that we're already seeing a lot of issues from this sector.

Climate change [will] lead to negative impacts on agriculture production (crop yields) and financial loss, livestock production and farming infrastructure, from increased frequency and severity of extreme weather events and long-term impacts of climate change.

This isn't me making it up. This comes from the government of Alberta.

Biodiversity and ecosystem services. I think that the members will be particularly interested in this area. I've heard a number of times that many of the members are outdoor enthusiasts, whether they like to fish or bird-watch or whatever it is that they like to do. I certainly like to bird-watch. I know that that sounds a bit weird. But in biodiversity and ecosystem services climate change is expected to impact [the following] . . .

- various ecosystem services and benefits, including clean water, crop pollination and recreational opportunities.

So without action on reducing emissions, conservation, and mitigation of the impacts, we're already going to feel – we are going to see more damage.

I like to think that when scientists tell us things – and most scientists don't tend to agree with each other. It is a bit weird to hear 11,000 scientists from around the world tell us, you know, with the same voice that we have a problem. Our scientists are telling us that we need to conserve.

Anyway, the United Nations in May told us that there are 1 million species currently at risk. One million. Now, it was really awful to see individual examples of those species lost, but you have to put that into perspective. There are a million that we will see that are at risk. They'll be gone. You know, we all saw those pictures of the little burned koala bear that was injured in the bushfire and eventually died. In the reporting the scientists have said that these are essentially extinct.

The energy supply: here's a topic that you all might be interested in, that climate change will affect energy supplies by doing the following:

- disrupting energy generation and supply during extreme weather events.

I think we've seen examples of that. We saw an example of that during the Fort McMurray fire. Sadly, so many of the folks that live in the northern communities there are actively employed and engaged in the oil and gas sector, and I know that those fires not only had a huge human toll . . .

The Chair: Hon. members, are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Chair. Since the previous speaker, the Member for St. Albert, was talking about climate change and a climate emergency and whatnot and she talked about Fort McMurray a lot, having worked in Fort Mac, having worked in that industry for almost 30 years – and I made a living out of working in the oil and gas sector – on behalf of the good people of Calgary-Edgemont I thought that I should respond, just for that part of Bill 20.

Madam Chair, if you remember, when we sat on that side of the aisle, you were with me, and we challenged the previous government on their climate leadership action plan, which is CLAP. We said that it was all economic pain without any environmental gain. Our legacy party members at that time asked them: show us the economic impact analyses of all your major policies, including CLAP. I had a front-row seat there, asking them all those questions, and I never got any answer during those four years.

And here we go. Now the table has turned, and we are sitting on this side. They're sitting on that side. They're entitled to their opinion. But don't try to imply that we ever said that climate change is not real or anything. In fact, I raised a point of privilege, and the previous Speaker, Bob Wanner, called out the previous Premier and told her not to call me a climate change denier.

Having said that, when the member was talking about the climate emergency, she also talked about the United Nations. The people of Calgary-Edgemont elected me to represent Albertans and to look after those 200,000 unemployed Albertans in Calgary, Fort McMurray, Cold Lake, Bonnyville, Peace River, everywhere. That is our priority.

Talking about greenhouse gas targets and emission reductions, that's why my colleague the minister of environment is working on TIER, the Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction Implementation Act, 2019, which will focus on emission reductions without taxing regular Albertans. If members opposite are really serious about bringing Albertans back to work, then support some of those policies we are bringing in.

Let's go back and talk about these energy products shipping to the markets where they're required and getting fair value for our products. That's what the Member for St. Albert mentioned. Madam Chair, as you know, I was born in rural India, and I personally experienced energy poverty. I don't know if the Member for St. Albert ever had that experience, but living in India, growing up in a village, I had seen many of our neighbours – I was fortunate. We had cooking gas, and we had intermittent power. It was not regular. There were power cuts all the time. The folks in my village, when they were trying to cook their meals by burning, you know, forest waste and plant waste – I mean, they're still doing the same thing in many villages in India and China. That's where most of the world's population is.

If we want to reduce global emissions – our contribution, Canada's contribution, is only 1.6 per cent of global emissions. When I was in opposition, I challenged the NDP: if you're so committed to greenhouse gas reduction, then let's do a study if Canada is an overall net contributor to emissions. Let's look at the supply-and-demand situation and see: how much carbon are we emitting, and how much do we need since Canada is the second-largest country by footprint? What's the supply-and-demand situation with the carbon? Oh, then they started saying again, "Oh, he doesn't believe in climate change" and things like that.

That was in the past. They couldn't give me any convincing argument, even till today. So I went to the universities and asked academia to show me the calculation of carbon supply and demand in Canada. I'm still waiting for that information. But the fact remains that Canada only contributes 1.6 per cent of greenhouse emissions of the world. So even if you shut down hydrocarbon production and processing in Canada, we are only going to reduce that 1.6 per cent.

What's the alternative? The alternative is, as I said before, that people in India and China need clean fuels. Canada can actually produce our natural gas here and ship the LNG to countries like India and China so they can get off burning coal. That's how you reduce greenhouse gas emissions. I mean, we have a different approach. That's why we are saying that our TIER will address most of that.

Also, the member talked about all of the priorities of Bill 20 and how to help Albertans, which we are trying to do. But to do that, first we had to create the wealth. Before these socialists lecture us on how to distribute the wealth, somebody has to create the wealth. That's why we brought in all these economic policies: to grow the economy, to create jobs, and get people back to work in Alberta. I don't care what the United Nations gives me as a target, but the people of Calgary-Edgemont tell me that they're looking for jobs today in Alberta. That's our priority, to get 200,000 unemployed Albertans and many Canadians back to work before we worry too much about Paris or United Nations targets and all that.

I think members opposite should be realistic. As I said before, they were in government for four years. We can look up their record. Debt and deficit have gone up, unemployment has gone up, and the crime rate has gone up. Everything has gone up, and now today they are there holding us to account, which I really appreciate because that's their job. At least, they should be good at that. In four years in government they didn't do their job of growing the economy or creating jobs. In seven months we are trying to bend the curve and put us back on track to grow the economy and create jobs. They should be patient and they should be realistic instead of talking about the United Nations.

The Member for Calgary-McCall: his priority should be to represent people in Calgary-McCall, not in the United Nations countries and other rubbish. We heard that when they were in government. They tried that. Now people have shown them their place. At least, now be respectful; worry about the people who elected you, not about the United Nations, and support the good policies and hold us to account. We are here to listen. If you have any practical suggestions, workable suggestions, our government is open to listen but not to that rubbish. So, please, please understand why you are there, and support Bill 20, and let's go home and listen to the constituents. Then you'll realize.

Thank you so much.

The Chair: Other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood.

Member Irwin: Oh, my goodness. Wow. Thank you for the applause, by the way. You know, I have spoken to Bill 20 a couple of times. Just as I said before, I'm not proud to speak to this bill because I'm quite concerned about a lot of it. Before I get right into this, I do want to address the comments from the Member for Calgary-Edgemont. I'm quite concerned by such a myopic view, in which we can only be concerned about our own riding and not about the plight of others around the world. That's quite, quite scary, narrow-minded thinking, in my opinion. I was a proud social studies teacher, and one of the things we encourage our young people to do is to be global citizens, and we encourage them to take critical perspectives on the issues that affect all of us, not just those in our local communities but in the global community. Like I said, to hear that that member is criticizing the Member for St. Albert for having a view of the global community is quite concerning. We should all be concerned by that perspective.

I can't speak too long, but I do want to just talk about a couple of things in Bill 20. I've mentioned before that this is a giant omnibus bill that we have. Within this bill are dozens and dozens of sections, each of which should, on its own, be debated. I must again get on the record to point out how harmful an approach this is, when so many diverse pieces are being lumped together and are not getting the debate which each deserves.

What are some of the consequences of Bill 20? Paying more personal income taxes through a nefarious tax grab; higher property taxes; loss of venture capital; millions lost in the film and TV industry; loss of tech sector jobs; loss of companies investing in research and development; hikes to property taxes; money being diverted from community organizations, which I'll talk about more in a minute; fewer funds for life-saving cancer research; as the hon. Member for St. Albert talked about, the loss of funding for environmental protection is quite concerning; the green line being in jeopardy, the west LRT being in jeopardy; and the list goes on. That is not even an exhaustive list of what is contained within this terrible omnibus bill.

Now, I want to chat a little bit about the loss of the funds in particular: the cancer prevention legacy fund, which I've spoken about in the House before, that does crucial work to address cancer; the access to the future fund, which, of course, deals with postsecondary education; and, as my colleague talked about, the environmental protection and enhancement fund. Of course, we've heard the members opposite say: no, these funds aren't being lost; they're just being streamlined. It is quite worrisome, because when you lose those dedicated funds, that are addressing some of the most crucial areas like cancer prevention – I bet that most people in this House have been affected by cancer in some way – the worry, which is quite a reasonable one, is that this will lead to less accountability and the ability for this government to move and shift these funds to wherever they see fit.

Now, one of the big ones – and, in fact, it's quite timely because there were folks in the gallery today who were representing some of our incredible community leagues here in Edmonton. One was Greg Lane, who was representing the McCauley Community League. McCauley is a vibrant neighbourhood within my own riding that I'm so proud to represent. McCauley includes Little Italy, parts of Chinatown, and it's a diverse, incredible neighbourhood. I live just north of McCauley, too, and I see every day the work that community volunteers do in McCauley and in all the neighbourhoods throughout Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. People like Greg, who was here today, are rightly concerned about the impact of the changes to the lottery fund.

You know, these are volunteers who do so much on already little. We ask a lot of them as community members, and they don't often get the credit that they deserve. I worry that with the loss of the funds that one of my colleagues talked about, the CFEP and the CIP grants, the strength, the health, the vibrancy of our neighbourhoods are very much at risk. I know – and I'm just going to talk a little bit about some of the specifics – the minister has assured, "Oh, you know, funding from the lottery fund will continue to support community programs," but unfortunately the numbers are painting a much different story.

CFEP, the community facility enhancement program, for instance, is being cut by 35 per cent. I've heard from my colleagues, I've heard from folks in my riding who have already been told that they're not getting those funds. Again, these are for critical community projects. McCauley and McCauley Community League: I'm going to stick to that example. I'm so proud of that neighbourhood. It's incredible. Like I said, it runs on the strength of so many volunteers, but it also has a few challenges, right? McCauley has some of the highest rates of poverty in the province. You know, a lot of folks struggle with mental health and addiction challenges. We also have the bulk of affordable housing and a lot of social service agencies within the boundaries of McCauley. So it is quite fair for Greg Lane, the president of the community league, to come here to the Legislature and to say: "Look, these funds are absolutely critical. We have an incredible community, but we need support, and we've relied on government support for years."

I ask the members opposite to think about that. The community leagues – I know Calgary has community associations, and I know that rural communities have community groups as well – are so reliant on those funds. They can't do it alone. I ask the members opposite to think about Greg and to think about the other community leagues that will struggle and that will be very much in jeopardy without this dedicated funding.

All right. I said that I wasn't going to speak too long, but I just want to mention one other thing. My concern, in particular, is about some of the impacts on the arts community. I've spoken about this in the Legislature already, about the loss of the film credit. My riding of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood also has a vibrant arts scene, you know, whether it's the Carrot Community Arts Coffeehouse, the Arts on the Ave organization, the Works. The list goes on. We've got a number, and I know I'm missing some. But I've heard from folks in my riding who work in the arts industry, in fact from folks who work in the film and screen industry who've said: "You know what? We're very much concerned. We saw what the NDP government was doing with diversifying the economy and moving towards a brighter future, one that focuses on the arts, one that welcomes the arts and fosters an appreciation for the arts." They spoke out about: "Look, we've seen a growing, thriving Alberta film and screen industry." Without a competitive tax credit, without rural incentives – they spoke about that as well – they're worried about the negative impact on their industry.

I wanted to get on the record just reiterating those concerns. Alberta is strong because of its diversity, and there are people who've spoken out and said that they're concerned about the fact that by not investing in the arts and, in particular, the film and screen industry, we will see that investment leave. You know, we've had so many incredible film productions shot right here in Alberta, and those are definitely in jeopardy. Again, I ask the members opposite to consider those investments as well.

All right. Again, I urge the members to think about a couple of things there, the impact on communities, whether that's community leagues, whether that's investment in the arts. I could have spoken about a whole list of other things that are inherent in Bill 20, including some of the impacts on transit funding, for example, another issue that impacts my riding significantly.

With that, I will end my comments. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. member . . .

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Sorry. I didn't actually quite recognize you. I will now. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Madam Chair, once again. It's my pleasure and honour to rise and speak to Bill 20. I just wanted to speak to some of the changes that the bill is proposing. You know, converting the Alberta screen-based production grant into tax credits: basically, this is a move that is not really supporting the industry. In speaking to this bill yesterday, I shared a quotation from one of the key players in this area who is working very hard in this industry and who has proven, if this industry gets reasonable support, what kinds of outcomes it can bring. I just actually shared the kind of pain and suffering, you know, the reaction coming from the industry. I just wanted to share a little bit of my experience on the other aspects that this bill would have.

The film industry, you know, is quite a growing industry and very fast paced, not only in Canada but around the world. The wise move would have been to think about that, about how the industry is growing across our borders. Like, the industry is growing big time in B.C. Especially when we are going through a tough time and people are looking for opportunities, this would actually cause, I would say, harm to our economic prosperity, and this is biggest, actually, with respect to diversifying the economy.

This sector is quite popular among our youth. I see more and more people showing their interest. Students want to study digital media in the film industry or in visualized designing. Thousands of students are already studying or preparing for study at NAIT, SAIT, or a number of the institutions in Alberta. They already will have the effect of their education being more expensive by the move being proposed, the change being proposed in this bill. Not only that, but they will be going through this very harsh, hard time, expensive education, which will also limit the potential and scope of the jobs in this industry. It will not only be a lost opportunity for these young folks; it will also be a lost opportunity for the province. We will end up losing these skilled workers, the talents that Alberta needs to build on. Those are some of the reasons.

I will probably once again speak to this bill sometime later on. There are a number of things that I have been looking at in the bill. Repealing the city charters – the reaction of mayors, the cities' concerns – deindexing the benefits and deindexing the tax brackets, the impact this bill is going to have: those are a number of the things. Due to this, I am opposing the bill. I just wanted to take the quick opportunity during this afternoon to be on the record that these are things that cannot be supported in any way. On behalf of my constituents in Edmonton-Meadows and Albertans I oppose this Bill 20 once again.

Thank you for the opportunity, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to stand up and again speak to Bill 20, Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019. I just wanted to finish some of the comments that I had left unfinished earlier, really focusing on the piece on page 55 of this legislation under the Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act. It's the disestablishment of the fund, the environmental protection and enhancement fund, and that is at the bottom of page 55 of this bill.

I was talking a little bit earlier about why it is so important. First of all, I think it was really disrespectful to not have this on its own so we could fully debate it because this is a really important topic, but from the government's website what I started to list were some of the things that the Alberta government, whether it's researchers, scientists, government staff – they've put together information for us, for all Albertans really, to look at.

These are the impacts of climate change that are coming. I talked a little bit last about energy supply.

Climate change could affect energy supplies by:

- disrupting energy generation and supply during extreme weather events
- increased stress on transmission infrastructure

I think we can all sort of understand what that would look like in the event of a flood or a fire.

- increasing demand on electrical generation (additional loads created by cooling requirements)

That's pretty straightforward. With temperatures rising, cooling requirements will be a reality.

- Extreme weather events.

I think we all can understand and know exactly what that looks like and how truly dangerous that is, whether it's droughts that impact not just the well-being of the incredible people that are farmers and producers in our province, but it will devastate their ability to produce, and it will devastate our economy because we are heavily reliant on them not just to feed us but to add to our economy.

- forest fires
- heavy precipitation with associated increased risk of flooding [of course]
- individual severe storms

Now forestry. Here are some warnings or some information about what will happen. This is directly related to climate change.

Warmer temperatures and reduced soil moisture create conditions for:

- continued mountain pine beetle infestation

I don't think any of us have driven through Alberta and British Columbia and not seen the enormous power of a little beetle.

- grasslands displacing existing forest ecosystems
- greater incidence of forest fires

We've discussed that.

Infrastructure is super important.

Infrastructure (such as buildings, roads, bridges, pipelines and electricity transmission) is generally sensitive to gradual changes in temperature and precipitation patterns. Extreme weather events can easily overwhelm the capacity of infrastructure.

Then there's water resources.

I could go on for longer, but I will not. I'm going to wrap up with a couple of things. It is really important. We all like to talk about the economy, which is perfect. Let's talk about it, what we can do to mitigate damages to grow the economy, to diversify, but here's a quote. According to the Insurance Bureau of Canada, Alberta has experienced the two most costly disasters in the country's history with the Fort McMurray wildfires estimated at $3.58 billion and the 2013 floods at $1.7 billion. These are realities. This is just in the last few years, Madam Chair.

I wanted to address the member opposite who had some comments. I'm just going to end on this because I'm getting the evil eye, but I wanted to address those comments because it's a common reaction, when people talk about climate emergency, to say: well, we're not that bad; we don't litter that much, and we don't produce that many emissions when you compare us to, say, China or India. Well, that's irrelevant. It doesn't matter what other countries are doing. It matters that we stick to our agreement and our carbon emission budget and that we do what we can.

I would say to the member that there are many nations – I think there are over 30 island nations – now represented at the United Nations that will be directly impacted by climate change. They hardly produce any emissions compared to Canada, compared to Alberta, yet they are directly feeling the impact of this emergency.

I think all of us can remember the stark images and reality that came out of the Bahamas, right?

On that note, Madam Chair, I will end for now. Thanks.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak?

Seeing none. Are we ready to vote?

All right. As agreed to on November 6, there's been a request to vote in sections and blocks. We will vote from block A to block I, starting with block A. Block A includes sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 11, 12, 14, 15, and 23.

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Any opposed? Carried.

The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Chair. Based on the hour – there are about three minutes left; I think everybody has worked hard, and I'm grateful for the good debate from both sides of the House – I will move that we rise and report the bill.

[Motion carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 20. I wish to table all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed, please say no. So carried.

Mr. McIver: Now, Madam Speaker, I would move that we adjourn until 7:30 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:58 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, December 4, 2019

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Milliken in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 21 Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered at this time? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-North West has risen.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill 21 in committee. You know, I was thinking about it this afternoon. Sometimes it is a legislative prerogative or a tactic to filibuster bills from time to time. Both bills 20 and 21 are so thick, with so many different topics. I've spoken on them a number of times here, and I still haven't picked off all of the areas that need to be canvassed, quite frankly. I think that speaks to just how, I guess, inappropriate this sort of legislative tactic is, and I would really strongly recommend that the government refrain from doing this in the future, these omnibus bills. I mean, what you can do is have a miscellaneous statutes bill, and then you can bring that forward, and we can all talk about it together and find things that we can all agree on ahead of time need to get cleaned up in the legislative process.

Taking substantive things that don't necessarily relate together and putting them together into these big omnibus bills: you know, it's just really clunky. You might think: oh, well, the public maybe just doesn't pay attention anyway, so it doesn't really matter. But they do, right? I was just having a conversation with somebody on the way in here today. They were at a function. The person said: you guys are on 20, 21 tonight, I guess, eh? This is, like, Mr. Joe Public talking about these things happening in this Legislature. So don't think you can get away with building giant omnibus bills and debating them in the middle of the night, because people are watching – they are indeed – and with good reason.

Tonight I just wanted to start off by talking about the issue around indexing. You know, if you have been an MLA for the last seven months or the last seven years, you know that a lot of constituency work that comes into your office is in regard to income supports – right? – either seniors' benefits or AISH and so forth. When we had an opportunity, finally, to form government and to put these income supports into an indexing formula based on the consumer price index, that was a huge step forward for ensuring that people would not be falling behind. I mean, already if you're living on seniors' benefits or seniors' lodge programs, AISH, you are living a very, very modest existence anyway. To at least ensure that as inflation pressures increase – rent, food, and so forth do increase in price over time – those benefits are indexed according to CPI, or the consumer price index: it's eminently reasonable, logical, and normal to do that. It was a long time coming, and I think that we really helped a lot of people as a result of that.

To move off indexing – and I know that the government is using the word "pause," right? But when we take something away, it's awful hard to get it back. Like, it took 15 years to move AISH to an increase that was commensurate with inflation and the cost of living, so I'm really, really reluctant to presume that a pause means that maybe it's coming back next year. Maybe that's the way we can approach this. I mean, I would certainly be less inclined to, you know, rally the troops and fight if we know that we are going to resume indexing next year. But once bitten, twice shy. I think that for the many Albertans that are living on these very modest income supports, they want to make sure that they have them and that they're not just being paused – a cut really is what it is – and presuming that they're going to come back. I think that it's probably a realistic approach to say: once you see it, wave it goodbye. And we all suffer for that.

When people live in poverty and they're slipping down on that poverty scale – in other words, not meeting the inflationary pressures that we live in in the province – you end up with a whole host of other problems that really end up costing more money for the government in the end. If someone can retain some measure of health and stability and mental health and security that come with, you know, the knowledge that your income supports are stable and will be indexed, then that individual is much more likely to be able to carry on in society, to live independently, and to avoid both physical and mental issues that can end up costing the health system considerably more than the nickel-and-dime cuts that you are proposing here in Bill 21. It's just like you are making an investment in ensuring the stability and the security of someone's modest income supports. I would venture to say that there is a direct correlation to having an exponential saving by those people living stably and reasonably healthy, both physically and mentally, right?

These support benefits include the seniors' benefit as well. We know that although Alberta's population is the youngest in Canada, perhaps the biggest increasing demographic population is seniors – right? – from now over the next 20 years, it's projected. Again, to make sure that we are having a stable, safe, and secure income support program for seniors here in the province of Alberta, our responsibility here in this Chamber is to ensure that our seniors population has that to look forward to. Again, it's a very modest benefit that helps to support a living income for people to live independently and to meet their physical and mental needs as well. Again, if the indexing of that against inflation is taken away, then instability and that descent into poverty are much more likely to occur.

Again, I really don't think that making these sorts of changes and cuts really saves that much money, right? If I can reach into the minds of the UCP cabinet, which I'd love to do – let's give it a try. You know, each person around the table said: well, okay; everybody has to throw something into the pile to reduce the deficit and so forth. But I think you have to take two steps back from that. That mindset is very narrow in scope. As I said before, making investments in income supports can help to save money down the road for acute health care costs and mental health issues as well.

Also, it's important to send a positive message to all Albertans. I know for a fact that the vast majority of Albertans are a very hopeful, sharing, and caring group of individuals, and what we do here in this Legislature is meant to be a reflection of the values of who we are as Albertans, right? So if you are somehow stepping outside of what is considered to be acceptable in terms of values that Albertans share – what we do here in the Legislature and what you do as government, making cuts to vulnerable people, is outside the bounds of what is acceptable to be an Albertan, quite frankly. We must ensure, every step of the way, that the values of the people that we represent are being reflected in the laws and the regulations that we produce here in this Chamber, and this doesn't meet that test at all, not even close.

We know that seniors that worked hard their whole lives and contributed to this society suddenly have the rug pulled out from under them – right? – by not having an indexed seniors' support benefit available for their security and well-being. That's just wrong. You know it. When I say it out loud, you know in your heart that that doesn't wash. For us to enshrine something that is essentially wrong in legislation, like this is attempting to do here today, is not conscionable. I don't accept it even a little bit, and I know that most people in this room don't either. At least we in the Official Opposition have the latitude and the capacity to speak up and call it what it is.

The other issue that I have not really commented on too much in Bill 21 – I guess I just wanted to add a little bit more information around the tuition cap and the issues around advanced education, because that's my responsibility as the critic for advanced education with the Official Opposition. I have made some obvious comments on this from the time that Bill 21 was brought forward, but in the interim I have had an opportunity to speak to a lot of postsecondary education groups – student unions and advocacy groups and just individual students, quite frankly – that have given me more information about just how damaging this allowance for tuition to go up very dramatically over the next three years will be for the thousands of people that are in universities and colleges and trade schools and so forth and then the many thousands that are saving in anticipating attending postsecondary here in the next number of years.

We know very well that there's a huge demographic of young people sort of between junior high and high school right now that are moving through the public education system that will need both spaces and capacity in our postsecondary institutions right away. This isn't something that we can hope and dream about like it's, as the Finance minister said about diversification, some luxury that we might be able to entertain in the future. Postsecondary education for this huge contingent of tens of thousands of students that will be entering postsecondary here in the next few years: that is not a luxury that we can entertain later. That's coming. It's coming fast, and we need to build that capacity, right? There's no compromise. There's no negotiation about that.

You know, as we've all learned, I think, in the last few months, maybe earlier, we have the lowest participation rate in the country for postsecondary education and, interestingly, the youngest population in Canada, too. Those are just, like, two very significant and concerning numbers that will meet together in these next few years, and if we don't build the capacity for affordable postsecondary education for those tens of thousands of young people that will be entering into postsecondary, we will lose those people.

There is a sweet spot when people will entertain going to postsecondary education. You know, God bless the people that go back as adults – maybe they started a family and did other jobs and then went back to university or trade school and so forth – but that is not common, right? The sweet spot for getting someone to go to postsecondary and actually pick up a trade or a career and so forth is just a few years after they leave high school. If tuition rates rise dramatically over those next three years or four years, it sends a huge negative message to those tens of thousands of people to say: "Hey, sorry. You know, we just built this huge brick wall, which is a 23 per cent increase in tuition, and good luck with that." But the unsaid message for, well, many people is: "We just can't afford it. We can't afford to go. We'll move on to something else."

There's a lot of conventional wisdom in our province that we have to overcome, right? I hear it all the time. I was a high school teacher for 20 years, and I heard it all the time. I had to fight against it. They would say: "Well, you go to university, get an arts degree, get, like, a $30,000 student loan, and you end up working at Starbucks. So why bother going to school?" That is the most poisonous thing that you can hear as a teacher or as a parent in terms of wasting the potential of young people that should be going to school and will enjoy going to school and will derive direct economic benefits from going to school and will become better citizens from going to school and create a better society from going to school. You know, we don't want to put up this 23 per cent higher wall with tuition to send the unsaid messages or the very loud and clear messages that say: "Sorry. You have to be quite well off to go to school now, and maybe you should just move on to something else." That's not the way to run a responsible government.

Yeah, I heard it loud and clear. I met with students from Athabasca University, for example, which is a really great opportunity for distance learning, where students can access university programs regardless of where they live, right? So it's very highly subscribed in rural areas. People were talking about having between $50,000 to $70,000 to, one individual, $120,000 in student debt from Athabasca University. You know, I was astounded, quite frankly. I kind of knew the situation but wasn't thinking about the numbers. When somebody actually tells you those things to your face and you see their situation, then it all becomes clear. You know, good for these students for taking the risk to go to school and accumulate those kinds of debts and to know that it's worth it in the end.

But suddenly where's the breaking point? If someone has a $70,000 debt, and you add another 23 per cent on top of that, maybe that's just the straw that breaks the back of that individual to say: sorry; I can't do this. You can do the math and say: "I could finish this degree. I'll work for 20 years. I'll be paying off the student loan for so many years after that." At what point is it worth it? Or at what point can you actually make it happen – right? – if you're a single mother, as this person was, or something like that. I just really am loath to think of increasing tuition fees so dramatically. That's what will happen, right? Mr. Chair, it's not like, you know, we would expect anything different.

I know that the strategy or the tactic of this government will be to say: well, universities set their own tuition rates; let's set them free. I think I heard that this morning from one of the ministers, that somehow we will set the universities free by cutting their funding. I mean, whoa, that's a leap of logic. It's almost astounding, in a way. It goes past being something I'd be mad at. It's just more like breathtaking. It's like: yeah, that's right; run free and try to hunt and gather the money you need to run. I mean, ridiculous is what it is, Mr. Chair, and I really don't want to be a part of that.

The other issue that I learned more about in regard to Bill 21 – and again it's to do with advanced education – is increasing the student loan interest rates. Again, it's easy. I know that the Premier loves to say that this is just a penny on the dollar or whatever, but when you add percentages on thousands of dollars, it's not pennies, Mr. Chair. It's hundreds of dollars or even thousands of dollars. And when you're a student, as many of us here in this Chamber today have been in our lives, or at least some of us, you know that you're not particularly well off while you're going to school. So student debt is a huge deterrent to getting people to go to school, and student debt has been increasing quite dramatically over these last number of years. Another increase of 1 per cent for someone who is going to school – and we did an average, I think, for an average person – can add up to $1,800 more for their university education.

I know the UCP talking points. They'll say: well, that's a good investment, and they're going to really benefit from that. But, you know, again, it's another nail in the coffin of someone who maybe is not going to be able to go, right? They just won't be able to go to university, or that will deter them from going to college or trade school or whatever. Then that's it. You end up with less of our young population going to school during that critical time when they should and need to go to school, and you lose, at the very least, the economic productivity that you would have gained from that worker getting the education and taking that into the workforce over a 20-, 30-, or 40-year period, right?

These things all add up: pennies on the dollar for making your cuts, but you have pennies here and pennies there, and you add it to a percentage point. Suddenly the math creates a giant hole that people can't get out of. That, I think, should be a concern for all of us, and it's a reason to not support this Bill 21 as written here this evening.

The last part of Bill 21 that I wanted to just make a couple of comments about: again, it's sort of moving back to a theme that we heard earlier today when we were talking about Bill 26. You know, I found it astounding. [Mr. Eggen's speaking time expired] Oh, darn.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to speak to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Obviously, I will likely focus on some areas that I'm particularly concerned about, and there's a lot in here to be concerned about, but I'd just like to add to my colleague's comments about the cost of postsecondary education in Alberta.

I want to preface those comments. I think that investing in our youth and our children and their education is the most important investment that we'll ever make. They truly are our future, and failure to do that is a huge mistake that we will pay for. What I think is so reckless about Bill 21 in terms of postsecondary is that we're literally making it more difficult for youth to attend postsecondary. I mean, I think there are some students that are quite fortunate that they have families that have perhaps worked for them and saved for them to be able to go to school, or they have been able to manage high school and maybe a part-time job, and they've been able to put some money away so there's less of a need for student financing. But that's not the case for everybody, Mr. Chair. It's really not the case for everybody, and if we are looking to increase participation in postsecondary, this is not the way to go. I believe that it's harmful to our youth.

To just give you a personal example, my oldest – my son, actually – went to school for longer than I'd like to talk about, because it's really stressful. He went to school for a long time, more than 10 years. I started saving when he was really young, Mr. Chair. I started putting away $25 a month, actually, from the time he was born. I saved and saved. I knew that I wanted to pay for both of their first degrees. I didn't realize that it was going to be, like, a life goal to be in postsecondary. I'm teasing him.

It's not possible. I watched him struggle after his first degree. He decided that he was going to do a master's. He worked, and he studied, and then he decided that he had to move away to continue. He wanted to do a doctorate. He went to the University of Toronto. I don't know if you've ever checked out what those guys make as TAs or assistants or researchers; it's actually pretty sad. He probably would have done better just working shifts in a fast-food restaurant, actually. It was difficult, but he did it.

Part of why it's an investment to make things as affordable and accessible as possible is that they give back. They give back in ways that we can't imagine. Personal example again: he was about five years old, told me what he wanted to do: hunt dinosaurs. I was, like: sure, honey; that's cool. I always thought he'd change his mind. He did not; he continued. He's a paleontologist today, and he studies dinosaur teeth. Now, some days I fail to see the value of that because it's dinosaur teeth, to be honest. But what I learned is that through methodical research he was actually studying the development of all kinds of things like enamel, like dentine – I didn't really understand the value of that until he explained it to me – and then he made the connection with modern dentistry. What is really quite fascinating is what modern dentistry and research have learned about the evolution of teeth and the creation of enamel and all of those things because the two sciences got together. Now, that's just one example.

My youngest is still in school also. She wanted to be a vet originally, graduated with an animal health degree, wasn't able to get into vet school because there are not a lot of spaces in Calgary. There is another school in Saskatoon, although I think that Alberta has some spaces that are dedicated there. Again, there are not enough spaces, and we aren't investing to create more opportunity for our young people that want to pursue careers like that. I'm not saying that's why she didn't get in, but she didn't get in. She decided that she wanted to do something that she thought would make a difference in this world. She decided that she wanted to pursue teaching. Of course, I'm incredibly proud that she would decide that she wants to be a teacher. I think that is an incredibly noble profession, and I know that she'll be great at it.

My stories here are sort of going to one place. I was not in a position to totally help them out. I was able to help them out at the beginning because I saved, but the reality is that they had to work and save money. They had to get a little bit of student financing. That's the reality for most people. Actually, I would say that the reality for most youth is that they don't have families that have been able to save for them, and they are reliant on financing and working. You can imagine the stress that puts on a young person to have to do that, so it's not surprising that there's an incredible need for mental health supports in postsecondary institutions. I think it's tough enough to be there competing and learning and all of those stresses in addition to trying to earn enough money to keep yourself fed and housed and all of those things.

To put this into legislation that just takes a wide swath on so many groups of people: I think that's incredibly, incredibly short-sighted, to attack this particular group of people that really are our future. We're not going to be in this place forever, and they will be our future. They will be the ones that lead us and lead this province and country. Once again, to not invest in our youth and our children is incredibly short-sighted.

I want to switch a little bit and talk about AISH and income supports. I know that I've said this a number of times. I think that at the beginning of this I was really hopeful that members from the government benches would actually hear what we're saying about AISH. I know that most of the government members are fairly new. There are some that have been here longer, and I think that they can attest to the fact, as my colleague said, that the vast majority of casework that you will do relates specifically to income support and things like AISH.

Although I've heard the minister say that these supports are more generous than in other provinces, it really doesn't matter, actually. It doesn't matter at all what other provinces are doing. What really matters is the Albertans with severe disabilities who live here, who we are tasked to look out for and to invest in, not just take care of but invest in. Investing in people is what makes communities stronger, and ultimately strong communities make strong economies.

I'll say it again. One of the things I was most proud of was when we indexed AISH. I wish we'd been in a position to increase the base amount more than we did. The reality is that we caught it up to inflation and then indexed it going forward. Although it's not a lot of money, $30 to $35 a year for somebody on AISH, what it is is a message that you no longer have to engage in advocacy every single year to say: "I can't live on this. I cannot live on 1,680-some dollars a month. I can't do it. It's impossible."

I think what makes AISH so different from other benefits is that one of the pieces that is reviewed and examined in the application eligibility process is the fact that the disability is so severe that it impairs that person's ability to earn a living and to support themselves. Now, there have been some people that have done really quite well in transitioning off AISH or starting to earn money and then have their benefits go down. That's fantastic. I think that we can do more to support inclusive employment and sort of move that transition along, but that's not the case for everybody.

If you think about it, someone in Alberta with a severe disability, a severe handicap: they are truly destined to live in poverty for the rest of their lives. Truly. They're truly destined to live in poverty. Indexing AISH benefits doesn't lift them out of poverty, but it addresses what it's supposed to. It addresses the cost-of-living increases that we all see every year.

I'll give you an example of a woman that I know in St. Albert who actually was injured. I think that her daughter was probably under 10 years old when she was so severely injured that employment was no longer a possibility for her. She is a single parent. Her daughter is still in school. She's on AISH. She rents an apartment for herself and her daughter. She doesn't drive, obviously. I don't know if any of you have been to St. Albert. We're fortunate to have a handibus, actually to have a few handibuses, and they have helped with the cost of that bus. It used to be $5 per trip, so $5 to go one way, $5 to go another. It's a wheelchair-accessible vehicle. There are not a lot of options in St. Albert, so as you can imagine, rent steadily goes up. We all know that food prices go up gradually every year.

Now this mom living on AISH has to deal with increased costs for her daughter to be in school, and those are transportation costs. I think that you heard one of my colleagues earlier today refer to an article, an announcement from St. Albert Catholic. They're now assessing additional transportation fees in the middle of the year, and that's because of decisions that you are making. You are making decisions that are directly impacting people right now.

This woman on AISH, trying to raise a daughter, does get a little bit of a top-up, but all of these costs go up, and they mount and they mount. I can tell you that her budget is so tight that she has credit card debt because she can't make it work every month. And I'm not talking about luxuries; I'm talking about, you know, that maybe her daughter needs a new winter coat and she can't find one at the thrift store. I'm not talking about luxuries like: I'm going to buy a car. I'm talking about the very basics.

There's a reason why, I think, it's getting close to where 20 per cent of the people that are using the food bank in the capital region, or Edmonton specifically, identify as being AISH recipients. More and more towards the end of the month people don't have a choice. It's not like they're making bad decisions about: you know, I'm going to spend my whole $1,685 or whatever it is on eating out or SkipTheDishes. This is about budgeting and not making it.

A cost-of-living increase helps. It doesn't eliminate the problem, but it helps. I'm actually asking the government members to stop and think about it. I know you have got to know somebody with a severe handicap in your constituency, in your family, in your life. Think about what that's like for them. Every year they have to cross their fingers: let's hope that the government of the day decides things are good enough in our province – and I don't actually know what standard you're using – and, you know, let's hope that it's good enough that we get that $30 extra. That's awful.

Indexing AISH was a way to say: "You are important. You are so important that we're investing in you. We understand that the cost of living goes up every year. We understand that. This doesn't actually cover all of it, but it's a start. It is something." People that are on AISH, that make it through that process – if you haven't supported someone through that process, you may not know that it's actually quite complex, and it is very difficult. It takes quite a bit of time, and it's not easy. Your disability or handicap or injury or whatever it is has to be fairly profound to be able to make it into that program to be supported, so to think that these folks that are on AISH and receiving AISH have a lot of options and choices is not realistic.

So think about your decisions. You have collectively decided to fund something like a war room. I don't exactly know what you're doing. I really have no idea what you're doing. But you've chosen to invest $30 million per year to support one sector, one industry. I don't know what else the war room is doing because you haven't told us. That's $30 million – $30 million – $120 million over four years. That would be over a decade of AISH increases. This is about choices. This is truly about choices. Who do you value? What's important to us? I'm going to say it again: investing in our people – all of our people, whether it's students, people with disabilities, our seniors – is always a good investment. All we are is a collection of people. At the end of the day, it is all about people. The healthiest communities have the healthiest people.

I wish I would have noted it, but I read an article – actually, it was a while ago now; I wish I could remember more of the details – and it talked about mental health and mental wellness. Obviously, there are huge issues and so many people that require support, but one of the tools that they suggested to address some of the mental health concerns that we hear about all the time was raising the minimum wage. Go figure. I don't know if any members here have ever actually lived in poverty or grown up in poverty – I'm sure there are some – but it is not easy. It is not easy at all. It's about really tough choices all the time. All the time. I'm talking about someone who had the ability to do other things or to make choices, but somebody with a severe handicap does not have the ability to choose.

I'm going to say one more thing about that. Increasing or indexing AISH or addressing the poverty of people with disabilities also goes a long way to prevent abuse, neglect, and violence. I can tell you this from first-hand experience as I know lots of people with disabilities that are on AISH, and very often they are unable to afford to move or they're unable to afford to leave a roommate that is perhaps abusive or to leave a relationship that is perhaps abusive because they literally don't have the ability to do it. They don't. That is what grinding poverty does, and that's what increasing risk does. If you are a part of government that is methodically looking at this particular group of people and saying, "You're not worth it right now; things have to get better for the rest of us before we invest in you," is that truly the message that you want? Is that what you want to be remembered for, truly, that you stopped indexing benefits for people with profound disabilities and people who are living in grinding poverty? You are making that choice. All of you are making that choice. It's incredibly sad to me.

You know, women with disabilities: we talk a lot about abuse prevention or reduction. There are so many things to talk about, but one of the groups of women that is so frequently the target or the victim of domestic violence – incredible abuse, not just abuse from a loved one or spouse or partner or anything like that but very often abuse by a caregiver. A caregiver can be a family member. A caregiver can be a roommate. A caregiver can be someone that you hire. But it's about the lack of ability to have financial choices, to say: "I'm done. I don't want you anymore. I'm moving. I'm moving to a new place." When you start to roll back the measures that have been put in place to address poverty, you are increasing that risk to women.

If any of you ever have any interest at all, which it doesn't look like, in reading up about women with disabilities in Canada, some of the stats are absolutely staggering. DAWN Canada – that's the acronym – is an amazing group that has a lot of information that would let you know. It will paint a picture for you about what it's like for a woman with a disability in Canada today. I don't know. I would hope that one of you would check it out and talk to somebody with a disability and ask them specifically: what does it mean to get an additional $30 to $35 a month? It's everything. It truly is everything. It's the difference between going to a food bank or not. It actually is so incredibly important.

You know, I've been overwhelmed with e-mails from people on AISH. It actually takes a lot for someone to share their personal story like that, to talk about what it's like, and I've received e-mails from all over Alberta. From your communities I've received e-mails from people sharing their information about what that looks like. They understand that you're not stopping AISH benefits and you're not changing eligibility or any of that just yet, but you did stop the index. They understand that. They see you. They see what you're doing. I will keep telling them, but they see what you're doing.

They sent me some e-mails that are absolutely incredible. They're talking about: here's my budget. They're actually, literally, sharing their budget to the dollar. "This is what I pay for my apartment. This is what I have to pay for my insurance on my apartment. This is my portion of medication that I have to pay for. This is what I pay for a low-income bus pass. This is what I pay for groceries." Do you know what the average range for groceries was in a month?

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

On Bill 21, I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen to speak.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm always incredibly encouraged to get up and speak really short so that the hon. member can continue talking about AISH. I don't know. Hon. member, would that be something that would interest you, you sharing the fact that people who are living on AISH are sharing their budgets with you? Member, I wouldn't mind if you would continue on in that vein, if you wouldn't mind, even if it's just for a couple of minutes.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. I get a little bit, like, emotional when I talk about this stuff. I have worked in this sector most of my adult life, so I know a lot of people. Actually, a lot of them are my friends, so I do understand how personal this is.

I have two brothers with disabilities. One is not here anymore. But the other one, you know, got a little help up and actually got a really great job that he liked, that he loved. I mean, he showed up for work early every day. Over 20 years later I don't even think he's ever missed a shift. He loves his life. There are great things that people with disabilities are doing. I don't want to make it sound like it's all, like, you know, depressing.

Why I'm telling you this is because investing in somebody with a disability is kind of magic, actually. When you do it well and when you address poverty, which is really, truly the underlying problem, you give people opportunities for real inclusion, right? That means learning with their friends. That means playing sports with their friends. That means living in a place that's safe, not having to live with a roommate that you really hate. You know, magical things happen. And when great things happen for people with disability, you start to reduce the need for so many things like access to acute care, access to mental health supports, access to the food bank, all of those things. I mean, you don't need the food bank when you start to have these networks of support. But all of this stuff is only possible when you invest in people.

Government members, you are deliberately choosing not to invest in people with severe handicaps. It's a choice that you're making. You're making a lot of other bad choices that I'm sure will come back to haunt you, but you are making this choice, and you are harming people.

I would like to read to you a couple of e-mails from people. These are not folks from St. Albert. These are folks from your constituencies, and I think it's really important for you to hear them. This message says:

Dear Marie,

I am writing to express my outrage and sadness at the govt. decision to de-index AISH, the seniors benefit and other payments. The measure of a government is not how it provides for people with everything but how it provides for people with [very] little. This government is truly showing its mean spiritedness and lack of compassion.

I deliver mail in a lower income area in Edmonton. I have had several conversations with my customers who receive AISH and other benefits who were [so] pleased with the decision ... to index the payments. The extra money may not be much but it meant [a lot] to them. Now to [take] it away is cruel.

I fully support ... the NDP caucus in vigorously opposing these mean spirited cuts.

That was not from a person on AISH.

This one says:

Dear Marie Renaud,

In regards to funding cuts, my brother has been dependent on AISH for nearly a decade. He had a brain tumor when he was five years old and the operation that saved him left him with a future, but with impaired motor skills and [severe] learning disabilities. Because of this he's struggled with maintaining a job and having independence.

Now in his early thirties, AISH has provided him with the chance to move out of our parents' house and live on his own over the last five years. This small piece of adulthood that most of us take for granted means a lot to him and gives him that independence that would otherwise be difficult on his own.

If [future] cuts are made, it would be devastating to [him] ... [devastating to his] independent life. If it came down to it, I know my parents would do what they [have to do] to provide financially for him, but they shouldn't have to, and my brother shouldn't have to live in fear that the leaders of Alberta would take away his rights to basic human dignity.

I am appalled to live in one of the [wealthiest] countries where the leaders will take what little the people have and continue to bail out the rich, but I still believe that there are good people fighting hard to change this and I thank you for your part in the fight.

Here's one from St. Albert that is quite interesting.

[Dear Marie],

Yes, [the Premier's] decision to de-index AISH will impact me.

I live in St. Albert, and have been on AISH since 2015. [I have] Cerebral Palsy . . .

The side effects of 54 years of Cerebral Palsy made it so that I [don't have any] cartilage in my right knee, a bulging disk, and spinal stenosis, [eventually] ending up in a wheelchair.

I moved into [subsidized, supported living] in February of 2017, with a cost of $901.00 per month rent.

Here is the monthly budget as it is right now: rent, $901; EPCOR, $60; insurance, $134; travel in St. Albert and travel into Edmonton to see the doctor, $170; telephone, Internet, and cable, $170; food, $240; exercise class, $45, which is awesome. There are actually subsidized exercise classes at Servus Place in St. Albert. I'm just saying. The total is $1,720. So every single month this person is short $40.

Recently, the lease amount for my one bedroom unit, which is also wheelchair accessible, went up from $901 to $965. Where I [am going to] find another $64.00 when I am already short $40.00 I do not know. AISH needs to go up with the cost of living for rent and food and utilities . . .

I would like to find work, but finding work that falls in-line with AISH [or even my ability to do the work, get there] is hard.

Here's a comment that actually addresses inclusive employment.

If you can work, there are [very few] employers willing to hire . . .

Oh, I actually know this person.

Accessibility is also an issue finding work, so we have rely on AISH . . .

We are still in the stone ages as far as people understanding and supporting the handicapped. We want equality, inclusion, but most of all [we want to belong]. If we belong, then we should also have an income [that makes] us comfortable and [able to] cover the [basic] necessities of life.

This is Alice. I've actually known Alice for a while.

Alice was really great to share her budget. You can see that she's not spending, really, much on anything. I think that, for all of us, to spend $240 on food – and I know Alice lives alone. But to make $240 on food last for an entire month, particularly if there's a holiday in there like Christmas – I know Alice doesn't have any family left anymore. But even for Christmas, I mean, this is a woman on $240 for food for an entire month. You know that she's going to the food bank. You know that she's needing a hamper at Christmas because she can't make it work. I think that just her comment alone about her one-bedroom, accessible, affordable housing, that has gone up from $901 to $965, when with careful budgeting she was already $40 short a month – to stand up and say, "We're deindexing because AISH benefits are good enough; you know, it's the highest in the country," it doesn't matter. That is irrelevant. What matters are Albertans, people here that we were tasked with looking out for and investing in. So the $30 to $35 a month that you have now removed from people makes a difference.

I'm going to try to read one more letter.

Hello Ms Renaud,

I'm not sure if it is too late to add my family's name to the list of families who will be impacted by the deindexing of AISH, but regardless, I will.

My son, who is currently only 16, and will age into the system under [the Premier's] current government, was born at 24 weeks and 3 days, weighing a grand total of a pound and four ounces. He tested positive for crack cocaine and was in withdrawal the first week of his life. He spent five months at the Red Deer hospital, undergoing various surgeries and procedures before finally being discharged into the custody of his teenaged parents. By all accounts, the mother was intelligent and loving but the father was older, possessive . . . and disinterested in parenting a disabled newborn.

My son found himself back in the hospital not quite a year later, this time as a shaken baby. He spent an additional two months in hospital while the government investigated. The dad was charged and found guilty . . . and as soon as the restraining order expired, my son's birth mother allowed [the dad] back into their lives [eventually].

Six months later my son was back in the hospital. This time it was because he was having seizures so badly he was stiff as a piece of plywood. He was found neglected in his own filth . . .

I'm going to leave this out.

. . . They begged my son's parents to call an ambulance but because of their previous experience with the authorities, they refused to do so. Instead, the pair, who [had] found this half dead 22 month old, called a taxi cab and stuffed [the baby] into the back of it and paid for his trip to the emergency room.

My son was again shaken so badly [that] his brain bled for 8 days. His body was covered in 60 percent chemical burns, from bleach the police theorize someone used to try and clean up the evidence of an obvious sexual assault. He lost his hearing due to the bleach burns.

My son spent four more months in hospital before finding his way into care and eventually at age 5 was adopted by our family.

And just let me say: thank God for adoptive families and foster families.

We're thrilled to have him. But he will never work. He's effectively a three year old toddler, [and that's] on his best days . . . He's a happy fellow but his contributions to his community are emotional only.

He is profoundly disabled. Severely intellectually disabled. Entirely blind, partly due to his premature birth, partly due to repeated brain damage . . . He is mostly deaf. He is non-verbal and has four sign language signs: Yes, no, all done and thank you. He is quadriplegic, has zero use of his arms and hands, cannot stand on his own for even one second; is tube fed, diapered and confined to a chair. His world is small. And now our provincial government is intent on making this world [a little] smaller.

I'm not entirely sure how an adult is supposed to live on [AISH] as it is. Especially an adult with complex needs who can't . . . feed or toilet themselves, let alone clothe or move without assistance. I'm not really sure of what will happen with my son once he turns 18. We live [in rural Alberta] and there are zero supports for people like my son. We, as his parents, aren't getting any younger . . .

We adopted our son knowing all of this about him but we trusted our government would help when the time [came]. That our government would take seriously the condition [of severe disability and what it's like for] severely disabled Albertans [to] live with [and that they would] treat them with respect and dignity. It is our great sorrow and disappointment to realize this is far from [the truth] under our current government.

This needs to change. This community of vulnerable citizens deserves better from all of us. Thank you for advocating on their behalf.

This is from Tanis and Bruce, who live in Beaver county, Alberta.

Mr. Chair, I received, like, so many letters. I don't even know how many letters. We reached out to all of the folks that sent us letters, and not everybody agreed to have their letters shared. I have tabled a number of them, and I have some of them here, but this story is, like, not unique.

When you deindex AISH, it's not just a manoeuvre. It's not just: "We're just going to save money. We'll put it back when things get better." You're harming real people right now, today and tomorrow and in January. I know that you don't think so. I can tell by your reactions. I just don't understand it. I don't understand how people can stand in a ceremony for the International Day of Persons with Disabilities, wear a button, wear a ribbon, and say: "Oh, yes. It's wonderful. We love inclusion. We want inclusion, but, yeah, we're going to vote on a bill that deindexes AISH, removing $30, $35 a month because, you know, they'll be fine. It's not that onerous." Come on. Come on.

Sorry. That's all I've got.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member. I would just ask that the hon. Member for St. Albert table those documents at the earliest opportunity.

Ms Renaud: I already did.

The Deputy Chair: You already did? Okay.

Then I will also just remind all hon. members that when reading from documents, the intent is to be brief wherever possible. In this chair's opinion, if you were to read a complete letter from an individual who could have just come up to the gallery and spoken out those words, then essentially you're doing something indirectly that couldn't be done directly.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has risen.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I personally want to thank the Member for St. Albert for reading out those letters. I was incredibly moved by the reality of the people that she was talking about. As she was reading, especially that last letter, I couldn't help but think of my own two sons, and I started reminding myself about why I got into politics in the first place.

I don't doubt that the members on the other side are also trying to make the world a better place, but they just do it from their perspective. I get it. But when you hear the reality of life that people on AISH have to live through – and it's not just the people on AISH; it's also seniors.

I'll never forget. You know, I was telling my own mom this story just last night. I remember a few years ago. There was a time, before being elected and before working at the University of Alberta, that I actually worked as a translator. This senior from the Chilean community had heard from somebody that I was a translator, and he needed help with translation when he went to the doctor. Of course, he called me up – he got my number from somebody – and I agreed to go help him for absolutely free because I'm just, like: how am I going to charge a senior from the community who's living on a budget just so that he can communicate with his doctor?

I'll never forget the very first time that I took this senior from the Chilean community to go visit the doctor. I happily drove, right? We went to the doctor. I translated for him, and then when we went back to his apartment, his one-bedroom apartment, he offered me a coffee, and he asked me to please sit down and just spend some time with him. He continued to talk to me about what his life was like living on a budget and how tight it was and how he really had to count the dollars that he was spending, very similar to the letters read by the Member for St. Albert about these constituents who live on AISH and how they're really living on a budget. When we deindex, yeah, it may only seem like cents on the dollar to the people on the other side of the House, but that's a lot of money for people who are living on AISH.

I'm trying really hard not to be judgmental. Of course, I understand that the approach that you're taking is an ideological one. But I must confess that I have no other words to share but to say that it's just heartless. It is. People who are living on a budget and are searching – they're already not being able to make it to the end of the month, and now you're going to take that little piece away from them, make it even tougher for them to make it to the end of the month. Why? Why? We all want what's best for Alberta. Let's not forget that Alberta is all Albertans. In this House, yes, we may have differing perspectives on how we make this province a better place to live, but do not disregard the reality of the most vulnerable Albertans and what the decisions that we are making together in this House are and how they're going to impact those very Albertans that we are here to represent. It is our duty to make sure that all Albertans are represented, not just a specific group.

You know what? I hear it time and time again. We get up in the House and we talk about who we represent. You know, the members from rural Alberta will get up and say: well, we represent rural Alberta. I'll admit it that sometimes I even get up in this House and say: we represent working Albertans and those who are part of unions. We do. But let's not forget that all of us collectively are here to represent all Albertans. I would say that the most vulnerable in our society, like those who live on AISH and those who are living on a budget that's so tight that they can't even make it to the end of the month, those should be the people that we make absolutely, one hundred per cent sure that we're helping them make it to the end of the month.

I believe there's a saying, you know – and I always get these sayings wrong, but I'll attempt this one. Maybe some of the members from my side can help me out on this one. It's something to the effect of: show me how you treat your most vulnerable, and I'll tell you what kind of society you are. Something to that effect, right? So here we are, and we're about to pass Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. I agree with the members on the other side. We need to make sure that we're fiscally sustainable. We do. We don't disagree on that, but where we fundamentally disagree is: who needs to make the sacrifices in order so that this government can make sure that we are fiscally sustainable? That is where we are fundamentally in disagreement. Making sure that these individuals – and I see that the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations shaking his head at me. I can't read his mind, so I'm not too sure what that's all about. Maybe he disagrees that we are fundamentally at odds with one another. So then why is he part of a cabinet that's even proposing this bill? That's the question that I have for him. Why are you part of a cabinet, a government that has decided – and this is, of course, through you, Mr. Chair – that they want to deindex AISH?

I agree with the Member for St. Albert. Just the other day there was a ceremony talking about people with disabilities and how we honour people with disabilities. Well, the best way that we can honour people with disabilities is making sure to treat them with the respect and the dignity that they deserve, and that's not just with words. It's with actions. It's with specific supports provided by a government that helps them, first of all, just in the first place, make it to the end of the month. Make it to the end of the month. Let's help these Albertans, who deserve our respect and should be treated with dignity, make it to the end of the month. This bill is actually subverting that by deindexing AISH.

Members of this House, with all due respect, I'm sure that you're here because you truly believe in that you want to make Alberta a better place for all Albertans. I truly believe that that's what your intention is. But if that indeed is your intention – this is, of course, through you, Mr. Chair, to all the members of this House – then how can you possibly accept deindexing of AISH as a part of this bill? It's not only the deindexing of AISH; it's also the deindexing of seniors programs. As I was sharing before about this member from the community and what my experience was with him in terms of going to translate for him at the doctor and how he was sharing with me – I mean, there are cuts to lodge funding, kicking dependents off of seniors' drug plans. All of this is going to have a profound effect – a profound, profound effect – on the lives of seniors.

All these questions that I have in my head for members from the other side of the aisle – and I'd love to hear from the people on the other side, how they feel about all this, about these questions that I have for you, these specific questions that I'm asking in this House of you. I honestly believe that we all have good intentions. We all have good intentions, but when you're supporting Bill 21 and the deindexing of AISH and deindexing of seniors' programs specifically, then I've got to ask you: well, are your intentions really in line with what you're trying to do? I'll remind members that we're not here just to represent one specific group of people. In our constituencies we represent everybody, everybody that calls our constituencies home.

To the members who represent rural communities: I'll tell you that before reverting to Islam, I used to be really involved in the Catholic Church. I used to actually be a volunteer for the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace. We used to travel throughout the province regularly, and part of my volunteer work with Development and Peace was actually doing education around specific issues with the developing world or the underdeveloped world, as I used to call it, when we would go on these visits to rural communities. I got a chance to meet a lot of people from rural Alberta, and, you know, before heading out into rural Alberta, of course, I had heard all of the stereotypes about rural Alberta, but I also knew about all the stereotypes that existed about immigrants and people who were like me. I knew that those stereotypes weren't true, so when it came to the stereotypes of people from rural Alberta, I was like, "Well, I'm not going to believe everything I hear, and I'd rather meet people and speak to them face to face and get to know them before casting judgment based on some stereotype that I had heard from another city slicker," if you want to put it that way.

Let me tell you that I was so happy when I got that chance through Development and Peace to actually go out into rural communities and meet people and understand that they have hearts of gold. They have hearts of gold, just like people here in the city do. They care about their neighbours. They want what's best for their neighbours. It doesn't matter where you go in this world; I think the majority of the people are always going to care and want what's best for the people that live in their community.

So, then, that begs the question, Members: why do that to people who are living on AISH? Why do this to the seniors in our province? Why make life harder for them? Honestly, if I were to go into any community, whether it be rural, urban, suburban – it doesn't matter – and if you were to ask people, "Hey, I've got a great idea. Let's make life more difficult for our seniors. Are you with me?" I'm a hundred per cent sure that a hundred per cent of the people I would ask would say, "What? Are you crazy?" These are the people that dedicated their lives to building Alberta. These are the people that have contributed the most to our society, to our culture, to our economy, to our communities, and not only have they contributed so much, not only have they raised children, but now they're helping raise grandchildren and even great-grandchildren. This budget, under Bill 21 specifically, is going to make life harder for them. I can't see and I can't fathom how we would ask any Albertan out there and they would agree with this. I understand that we want a province and a budget that's going to be fiscally sustainable as we move forward, but don't balance this budget, Members, on the backs of our seniors and the most vulnerable in our society. That is what I'm asking you here today. That is what I'm asking each and every one of you to contemplate here in this House today.

An Hon. Member: Say it loud and say it proud.

Member Loyola: Well, I'm glad that you find it funny. Members from the UCP are laughing at me right now.

The Deputy Chair: I just want to remind all hon. members to speak through the chair when engaging in debate.

If the hon. member could please continue.

Member Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. Members of the UCP are laughing at me right now. Through you, the chair, I say this, of course. That's what's actually happening in here. I'm getting a little adamant, a little passionate about my perspective because I don't think this is the right thing for us to do. Bill 21 and balancing the budget on the backs of seniors and people who live on AISH is the wrong decision to make.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen to speak.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity to rise tonight to continue debate on Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. I'd like to focus my comments for the next bit on one of the sections of the bill that deals with physicians in the province of Alberta. Now, of course, I do recognize that payments to physicians comprise a good deal of our spending in health care. It's understandable because physicians occupy an incredibly important place within that spectrum. They are the front line of care. They are where many people get the most attention in the system. The first relationship that most of us build, aside perhaps from the doctor and the nurses that birth us, is with our family doctor. So it's something of very great importance and I think very intimate and personal for Albertans, the relationship that they build with their family doctor, Understandably, it's an important relationship that we set up between government and physicians in the province for how we provide and fund the provision of that care. But what we see with this bill is the government attempting to approach what is a long and historic complex relationship with the same sort of heavy-handed, top-down, condescending, dictatorial approach that they bring to so many aspects of negotiation within the province of Alberta. One of the provisions we see within this bill is a provision to give the government the ability to unilaterally terminate the doctor compensation agreement with the AMA. Unilaterally, Mr. Chair.

Now, we've seen what this government thinks of contracts. We saw that back this spring with Bill 9. That came forward and basically said: well, we're going to break contracts with a large number of front-line public-sector workers in the province, including many in health care. This government doesn't actually like to sit down and have a conversation. It doesn't actually like to engage in negotiation unless it's got an axe to hold over your head. Now we see perhaps part of why this government feels it needs to give itself this unilateral ability that no government in Alberta has taken for itself before, with the revelation of their proposal to the Alberta Medical Association that was revealed this last Friday.

Now, I raise this, Mr. Chair, because I have had a large number of doctors reaching out. Indeed, I had over 20 health care professionals, including physicians, nurses, other front-line care providers, stand with me yesterday, raising their concerns in large part about this proposal from this government, which they are seeking, through Bill 21, the opportunity to impose unilaterally.

I have an e-mail here that was sent to the Member for Calgary-Hays, the Minister of Transportation, CCed to my office last week, an individual who is a family physician. He along with other colleagues provides full-scope family practice to the community of High River. That includes clinic, ER coverage, and in-patient – not impatient; I'm sure he's a very patient man – coverage. He says:

I voted for the UCP in the last election and, with a conservative government back in power, I hoped to see a return to common sense governance including fiscal restraint and austerity measures. From this perspective, I fully anticipated further reductions in physician payments over and above the recent voluntary $200M reduction in physician payments generated by the AMA's SOMB Rules Savings Initiative.

That was the $200 million reduction that we negotiated with the AMA as a government, Mr. Chair.

This doctor said: I fully expected that we would sit down with the new UCP government to negotiate some more savings. He welcomed that opportunity. He was happy to have a Conservative government that he thought would sit down and have a reasonable conversation. He said:

I would have supported a reasonable reduction to physician payments at this time, in line with rollbacks to compensation for other public sector employees.

On this, Mr. Chair, this is a physician who in fact would not agree with me on the proposed wage rollbacks for public-sector employees. This is a gentleman who is deeply predisposed to agree with this government.

But what does he say about the proposals this government is bringing forward for physicians? He says:

The changes outlined in these proposals are so deeply flawed and so terribly imbalanced that I cannot support them. In fact, I feel I must oppose them with great effort.

This is a man who supports and voted for this government, and he is saying that they're putting forward proposals so deeply flawed that he feels he has to take concerted action to resist them. Yet with Bill 21 we see that this government wants to give itself the ability to unilaterally terminate the agreement with these physicians without listening to them whatsoever.

The doctor goes on to say:

I have many concerns with these proposals, but the most serious is that they will undoubtedly have a dramatic negative [effect] on the ability of family physicians to provide comprehensive, patient-centred care.

This Minister of Health and this government like to talk about the fact that they are making these changes to improve and then create patient-centred care. This doctor, who was a supporter of this government – we'll see if he remains so if they continue on this path – is saying that this action, this proposal, which they intend to give themselves the power to unilaterally impose, would in fact reduce the ability to provide patient-centred care in a rural constituency represented by a government MLA and as a constituent of the Minister of Transportation.

He says that his rural group practice has calculated that with this proposed change just to the complex modifiers, so that being around the amount of time they spend with patients who have complex needs, they would see a reduction in the overall billings of their clinic by about 30 per cent. He said:

These billings constitute not only my salary, but the salaries of my staff and also [have to] cover all overhead costs.

These costs aren't going to drop by 30 per cent, so how can you expect his business to absorb this?

How could any business be expected to survive if revenue dropped by 30% overnight? And make no mistake, family practices are businesses . . .

Indeed, this government seems to be quite comfortable with business existing in the health care system. They want to create more of them. He said:

. . . businesses which provide nearly all of the primary [health] care infrastructure in this province; therefore, it is in the interest of all Albertans that these business remain healthy.

So what he says is that he's really only got a few options to respond to this kind of a change being proposed by this government. He said: well, family physicians will have to start seeing a lot more patients; we'll have to start booking one patient per every 10 minutes and limit care to what we can get done in that 10 minutes of time. Boy, that sounds like a great way to improve patient-centred care, Mr. Chair. Limit every single person that comes in to talk to their family doctor to 10 minutes of time, one problem, one appointment: we'll see you in two weeks about the next issue. Yet in Bill 21, that is what this government wants to propose, that it give itself the unilateral ability to terminate doctor compensation agreements so they can force through these sorts of short-sighted, ill-thought changes.

Indeed, the doctor goes on to say that the pushing away from being able to actually spend time with patients with complex needs, forcing or incentivizing what he calls "high-throughput care," essentially fast-food medicine – he says that we're going to lose supports for patient-centred care and preventative chronic disease management. That's going to just disappear from the front line of health care, from the family doctor's office, and he says that as a result, the province is not going to save a dime. He said:

The only change will be in the reduction in quality of care provided to patients.

He says, well, alternatively, if we don't want to go with a one patient every 10 minutes model and just keeping pumping them through, family doctors could attempt to see one patient per 25 minutes . . . and reduce their overhead enough to 'keep the lights on.'

So that strategy, he says, would mean we'll lay off clinical staff and family doctors will simply see 40 per cent fewer patients per day. I have yet to have anyone come to me and say, Mr. Chair, that we have far too many doctors providing care in rural Alberta. Indeed, this government in Bill 21 wants to give itself the ability to force doctors to go and work in rural Alberta. But as this doctor is noting, either it's going to be fast-food medicine, or you're incentivizing doctors to simply see fewer to be able to maintain their business as it currently stands.

He notes that the Minister of Health recently stated: "Nothing in [these] proposals will harm the ability of family doctors to give comprehensive . . . care."

This statement, says this doctor, is patently and demonstrably untrue, so either Mr. Shandro's office . . .

Mr. Hanson: Names.

Mr. Shepherd: Oh, pardon me. I apologize. I withdraw.

So either [the minister's] office is deliberately misleading the public or they have no idea what they're talking about.

But through Bill 21 this government wants to give that minister the ability to unilaterally terminate any agreement with the Alberta

Medical Association and choose to continue in ignorance of what front-line doctors are trying to tell him.

He talks about how rural emergency rooms are staffed almost entirely by family physicians.

These proposals would directly impact them:

a drastic pay reduction for family physicians [that work] in rural emergency rooms, on top of the cut that this government has also put through to rural on-call doctors in those facilities. He says:

Yet these proposals will have almost no impact on the billing of physicians working in urban emergency rooms.

He says:

How is this reasonable? Why are rural family doctors facing such severe cuts when our specialist colleagues are not?

He notes that the press secretary for the Minister of Health stated that:

The minister looks forward to working through the issues with the AMA at the bargaining table.

But the doctor notes that the problem with this statement is that [this] government has not agreed to negotiation.

He says:

In fact, [the] government has signalled it has no intention of negotiating with the AMA on these proposals.

That seems quite contrary to what the minister himself said in this House.

As several of these proposals directly impact physician compensation we have a legal right,

this gentleman says,

to collective bargaining over these issues.

This, Mr. Chair, is not one of those union thugs and socialists that this government likes to rave about. This is a man who voted for this government and a period of fiscal responsibility but is calling out the dictatorial, condescending, top-down manner in which this government is approaching that work. This is a man ready and willing to sit down at the table to help this government achieve these goals because he believes in their intent, and even he is so concerned that he feels the need to take concerted action to resist what this government is trying to force and impose and the effects it would have in rural Alberta.

I have another e-mail here from another family physician in the constituency of the Government House Leader, the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. This doctor says:

As a . . . physician in Rimbey, I write to you with grave concern, that the recently proposed changes in the Alberta Health's Insured Services Consultation are inappropriately targeted at family physicians providing complex care to patients with chronic disease, and would incentivize low value care with unintended consequences.

He echoes much of what his colleague from High River lays out.

He says:

Removal of these incentives to provide comprehensive care to complex patients will mean [those] patients will be encouraged [instead to have] to book multiple appointments, which means less access for other people, which means, oddly enough, creating more red tape for physicians, which is the direct opposite of what this government has said that it wishes to do.

He says that it will result in increased health systems utilization, force people to make more use, take up more room in an already crowded system that is straining and lacking enough doctors as it is in rural Alberta.

He says that removing these incentives [simply] encourages new graduates, the ones that this government, through Bill 21, wants to use practitioner IDs to force to go and practise in rural areas of the province. It's going to force them to go there and then incentivize them to provide what this doctor describes as episodic, walk-in style medicine rather than to commit to a comprehensive family medicine practice focused on continuity of care.

Mr. Chair, I hear these members of the government often talk about their communities, and when they talk about their communities, they talk about the value that you have in rural communities, that people care about each other. They take time to talk to each other, to understand how other people are doing, that they form relationships as a community and support each other, but this government, through this bill, wants to drive that out of the health care system, where people need that kind of comprehensive support, where it's the highest value for a doctor to have a comprehensive, full understanding of complex health care needs and instead incentivize a system of fast-food medicine.

The doctor goes on. He says, you know, that these changes discuss physician wellbeing.

He says:

I went into rural family medicine to provide service to a population in need, within a system that I believe valued continuity and comprehensive care when I graduated in 2018.

This is a new doctor, Mr. Chair, who of his own free will chose to go and practise in Rimbey, not at gunpoint because the government denied him a practitioner ID anywhere else. He chose to go there.

But he says,

[This] government's proposed changes [are going to] incentivize a style of medical practice that is [completely] at odds with what I am taught to provide and what I believe is best for patients. This can only result in job dissatisfaction, burnout and shorter physician careers.

This government has identified an actual need, which is more physicians in rural Alberta, and at the same time is cutting the fees that they want to pay to physicians in rural Alberta and wanting to push through proposals that are essentially going to tell those doctors, "You are going to work harder for less for longer," so they burn out and go, "Forget this. I got better odds back in the city."

This is a young man who was saying that that is not in fact what he wants to do. He wants to work in rural Alberta and provide comprehensive patient-centred care, and his government is telling him: no, we don't want you to do that. He says:

Already, I've had conversations with my cohort of graduates.

He said: you know what? With changes like this, we're looking outside of Alberta. If this is how our government wants to treat us and wants to approach us, the people that want to provide the kind of care this government says that it wants in the places where they say it needs to happen, then maybe it's time for us to start looking elsewhere.

He says:

I also write to you on behalf of the patients in our constituency, the constituents of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, represented by the Government House Leader.

He says:

They will feel the impact of these changes the most.

Perhaps if that House leader would rise, he could tell us how this young man is engaging in fear and smear.

He says:

It will be no surprise to you that the complexity of the patients I treat as a full time family physician in Rimbey are driven by a lot of factors, but . . . among them are age and social determinants of health.

He says: you know, in the municipality of Rimbey we have an average age of 43, compared to a provincial average of 38; a median income of about $30,000, compared to the provincial average of $43,000. He says that, as a result, the population that he treats in Rimbey is more prone to chronic disease, mental illness, addictions, polypharmacy, so requiring multiple medications, and frailty.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 21. Actually, I'm very interested to hear the comments from the Member for Edmonton-City Centre because he has such great and deep knowledge with respect to the concerns he's hearing from medical practitioners on the contents of Bill 21. I believe he's actually listening to these individuals and hearing their concerns and actually is concerned about the longevity, the investments, and the sustainability of our health care system, particularly serving those in remote communities such as rural areas. I'd really like to hear if the Member for Edmonton-City Centre has more to share on this issue. I really appreciate it.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you to my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud. I will endeavour not to take another full 20 minutes, but I do appreciate the opportunity to round out my thoughts.

I think it is really important, when I as an MLA in the heart of the city of Edmonton – and indeed, I've had members to my right express incredulity when I stand in this House and talk about concerns that I hear about in rural health care. But if these doctors feel the need to include me on these e-mails to ensure that somebody is asking this government to listen to them, that indicates to me that there is a problem here.

Now, as I was saying, this young gentleman notes that there are many complex issues in the area: chronic disease, mental illness, addictions, folks requiring multiple medications and having to deal with the interactions of that, and frailty. He talks about travel distance providing another barrier to care, and he says that those patients are going to face a disproportionate effect from these proposed changes, these short-sighted, ill-thought proposals that this government wants to force through to save a few dollars, perhaps to help backfill that $4.7 billion corporate giveaway.

He notes that the best evidence suggests that a strong primary health care system drives down health care costs. Indeed, that's what we hear this government saying that it wants to incentivize: more front-line patient-centred care that gets to issues earlier, before people have to go to an emergency room, before they develop a chronic condition, before they're in an acute-care bed or forced prematurely into a continuing care bed. That is the work this young man does, but he expresses deep concerns that the changes this government wants to force through in trying to force them to spend less time with patients are going to do exactly the opposite of what this government wants to achieve.

He also raises concerns about deinsuring the provincially required drivers' medical for aged 74 and a half and above. He says, you know:

Already, we are hearing that our patients prefer to attend walk-in clinics for this service, despite the fact that they have a comprehensive approach to those medical exams to make sure seniors are safe on the road. He says that their office takes 1 hour to assess a senior's appropriateness to drive, and if [this service is] de-insured, [they] cannot [possibly] compete with a walk-in clinic that provides this service in 10-15 minutes, completing the required form without access to the patient's complete medical history.

Basically, what he's saying is that an individual who a doctor has known, perhaps for decades, and has observed the deterioration or the progress of their health, if you take away the ability for them to be paid for doing this work and they have to charge for the time they would actually take to do this, then seniors are going to just be incentivized instead to go to someone who does not know them, has no background, has no knowledge, has no experience, and they will spend 10 to 15 minutes assessing whether or not that individual should be driving a vehicle, which is not good for that individual and is not good for the safety of our roadways, particularly for individuals who live in rural areas, where, as members of the government like to remind us, you are required to drive.

To the hon. Government House Leader this young man says:

I would urge you, on behalf of all patients in our constituency, to stand with me and oppose these proposed changes. I know this UCP government is highly motivated to make cost savings a reality, but these proposed changes have a high risk of driving overall systems utilization up by eroding the provision of comprehensive primary care in our communities.

That is one of my primary concerns, Mr. Chair, with a bill like Bill 21, which is an omnibus bill, which takes something this significant and with this level of impact and crams it in alongside a whole bunch of other wholesale changes from a wide breadth of legislation. The impacts from this decision could be incredibly significant, and I hope that these members of this government will listen to their own constituents who are responsible for and committed to providing incredibly essential and important care to other constituents of theirs and who want to be partners in achieving this government's ends of reducing health care costs. I hope these members will listen to them.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen to speak.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to rise to speak in Committee of the Whole again on Bill 21, a bill that I have had the opportunity to speak to a few times already. However, every single time I rise, I run out of time because there is so much to talk about. Today I actually want to begin my comments with respect to Bill 21 particularly around the provisions that talk about deindexing AISH and actually give my greatest, sincere thanks to the passionate and compassionate and heartfelt comments from my colleague the Member for St. Albert.

In particular, every time she rises to speak on this bill or on any matter that affects the most vulnerable people in Alberta, particularly those with disabilities, I am struck by what an articulate and human and feeling and passionate advocate she is. I believe that when she stands up and she reads into the record quotes and comments from e-mails and messages she has received from Albertans across this province, not just from her constituency, it speaks to the trust that Albertans have, knowing that she is a true voice to speak out and on their behalf. I particularly found it quite heart-wrenching to hear some of the letters and e-mails that she had received, as I believe anyone in this House who was listening would have felt so moved. To hear those personal stories of individuals who are reliant upon AISH – and sometimes the heartbreaking stories that have led to those situations are very difficult to hear – they also remind us of who we are here to serve. I'm really moved by the trust that Albertans have in the Member for St. Albert, because they do share these deeply personal and sometimes very difficult to hear stories.

I imagine a world where someone with that level of compassion would actually be the minister responsible for Community and Social Services, and I think about how incredible that would be to have somebody who deeply cares, not for political purposes, not for, you know, a desire to be in cabinet or to be in a prestige position within government, but to do it because she has an incredible amount of knowledge and truly is driven by representing these people in this Assembly and speaking for them, not to take their words from them, but to actually use their words and give them a voice in this House, which is really what all of us are responsible for, to actually give a voice to those constituents and those Albertans who otherwise would have such difficulties.

One of the things that I'm continually struck by, particularly when we're speaking about persons with disabilities, is how much they already have to self-advocate for themselves and how much their family members have to repeatedly advocate just for the basic services that many of us take for granted. Then to also take the time and the energy, because they have to, to actually reach out to elected officials and have their stories told in the House is just another burden that they have to carry, to continue to have to convince those of us in elected positions that their voices are worthy of being heard.

I really believe – I have no doubt actually – that the Member for St. Albert has received numerous, probably more than anybody else, statements and messages from individuals who are affected by this bill's decision to deindex AISH, and she speaks for them and gets those messages because they have trust. What I think undermines Albertans, particularly those with disabilities, in having trust is when they see it plain with their eyes, as we all see, that this bill actually is a cut to AISH. It absolutely is.

Now, I've heard the Minister of Community and Social Services, I've heard members from the government and from cabinet stand up and repeat back the inaccurate statement over and over again that there are no cuts to AISH, as if taking $30 away from individuals who are receiving $1,600 or $1,700 maximum a month is not a cut. Perhaps it's because they believe what they've been told in terms of talking points. Perhaps it's because they think it's a meaningless amount of money. We know the Premier believes that. He has stated that he doesn't believe it's onerous. But it is plain as day – it is absolute fact – that this proposed bill does actually remove and cut funds that individuals who are on AISH aren't going to get. Every month they're going to get less as a result of this bill. I don't know if there's any more plain definition of what a cut is, than to get less than what you had before, than what this bill is doing. Yet we've seen these members stand up and say that isn't true.

We have seen that this bill – and I've pointed it out in my previous comments in Committee of the Whole – removes protections from Henson trusts. It actually states that persons who are applying for AISH will now have their trust funds, money that has been put away by their families to care for them when their family members are no longer able to – clear as day this bill repeals that provision. Yet we've had the Minister of Community and Social Services stand up and say that isn't true.

Not only is it frustrating as a member and as an Albertan to hear government members deny what is actually factually in their own proposed legislation, but what it also does is it continues to break that trust. It continues to suggest to Albertans that government members are not actually looking out for them. I believe that that is the fundamental problem that we have right now, that by refuting what is in this bill, the government is breaking trust with Albertans. They're breaking faith with Albertans.

You know, I was a little surprised as well, I'll tell you, when I had a conversation at one point with the Minister of Community and Social Services. She seemed surprised when I told her that during my time campaigning and my time door-knocking during the election and prior to that, I had comments and conversations with a number of families in my riding who spoke about their children with disabilities, who spoke about the challenges around the family support for children with disabilities program, who spoke about their concerns about their children with disabilities having access to appropriate services and supports in the education system. The hon. minister said that she didn't hear any of that when she was door-knocking. You know, statistically I find that unusual because we know that no constituency has a monopoly on individuals and families with children with disabilities, but it also made me wonder if Albertans are not trusting the members to actually speak about these issues and to talk about these stories.

When we see after the election that the minister and government members stand up and actually try to deny to Albertans' faces that they are cutting supports for disability, well, maybe that's why Albertans don't have trust in them when it comes to this issue, when it comes to many issues, but particularly on this issue. Because while I believe the Member for St. Albert has probably more e-mails and personal, heartfelt statements from Albertans about the impact of this cut to AISH on their families' lives, I have yet to hear any members from the government read out personal statements or e-mails or messages from constituents who are on AISH who say: "Thank you for deindexing my AISH. Thank you for cutting my supports." I don't believe that any individual in this province would actually say that.

But, of course, I would love to be proven wrong. I would love to invite the government members to stand up, because we have yet to hear that as well, members who actually, some of them even just a year ago, were arguing passionately in this House about how important it was to index AISH, but there's silence on the fact that they're deindexing AISH now that they are the governing party. So I invite you to introduce and table in this House and read out those heartfelt messages from families of individuals or individuals who are receiving AISH who say: "Yes. Thank you. I don't think I want my AISH indexed to the cost of living. I'm fine to give up that $30 a month so that you can give away $4.7 billion to corporations because that's more important to me than being able to survive this month."

Please, again I invite members to table those messages. But perhaps they don't receive those messages. Perhaps what they're receiving – and we don't know because they're not speaking up to actually defend their decision to deindex AISH, other than to simply deny it, which actually isn't a defence. It's actually just factually inaccurate. I'd like to hear them say why they believe that this is an appropriate thing to do, especially those members who spoke out so passionately against it just a year ago. But that's not what we have. We don't have a government that's actually speaking for Albertans. We don't have a minister who's deluged with personal messages from individuals with AISH who are advocating for the cuts of the only meagre supports that they receive.

What we do have is members of the opposition and particularly the Member for St. Albert, because she has the credentials – she has the credibility; she has demonstrated her entire life that she is committed to representing and working hard for those with disabilities – so they trust her. They're sharing their deeply personal stories, and I know they're difficult to hear. I found them very difficult to hear, and I found it difficult to meet with parents of children who may be on AISH one day, who are currently disabled, who are crying in my constituency office because they don't know how they can have any comfort at all that after they pass, their children with severe disabilities will be protected and will have full access to AISH without being penalized for the fact that their family has planned ahead, into the future, for them.

I'm certain that I am not the only member who has had that experience. We already know that the Member for St. Albert has. I've heard many of my colleagues on the opposition side of the House speak about those. But I have yet to hear any of those members in government stand up and say: "You know what? I'm listening to my constituents as well, and I believe it's important to protect the most basic allowances that we provide to those with severe disabilities."

Again I'm going to quote my colleague the Member for St. Albert because I've been so inspired by her in the last little while. This is a new relationship. I didn't know the member prior to being elected. But I consistently hear her stand up with such honesty and conviction. Just recently in this Legislature she talked about actually measuring our progress with respect to serving persons with disabilities. She stood up and said, "It's not enough to give platitudes," which, unfortunately, is all we are hearing from the government, who say: "Of course, we care about persons with disabilities. But we're just going to cut their most basic services and make it more difficult for their families to have comfort that they will be protected going into the future."

Actually, the Member for St. Albert said that, you know, we do need to take measure and we need to evaluate. We can't just say that we care about these individuals. We need to actually put action into words and measure how we're doing, and that measure is actually that we're leaving no one behind. Yet I don't see that same measure of conviction from this government. I just think what a different world this could be for persons with disabilities, for vulnerable people on AISH if we had a minister with the same level of conviction and honesty and credibility as the Member for St. Albert.

I want to move to another part of Bill 21. Again, my colleagues have spoken to this issue, but I haven't yet had an opportunity to, so I'd like to raise it myself, and that's with respect to the attacks that Bill 21 makes on postsecondary education. Now, I think it's important – and I don't think this is lost on Albertans – to see that the cuts that we are seeing under Bill 21 to postsecondary education are simply a continuum of this government's underfunding and kneecapping of education from birth to adulthood. We know that we're already seeing within the Ministry of Children's Services that early learning coalitions have been defunded, parent link centres have had their contracts cut. We see that the Minister of Children's Services does not support early childhood learning, which is a key part of universal child care.

We know that the research and evidence is very clear that if you support education and early learning from a very young age for children, you can address issues, you can prepare them better for school, and an investment in that young age – we know there are brain studies. We used to in this government do early development, EDI, tracking to talk about the vulnerabilities of young children, and we know that if we invest in those early years, we actually, from a purely economic perspective, save ourselves so much more money down the road. We already see that this government does not believe in that prevention and investment in early learning. That's already clear.

Then the K to 12 education system. I'm speaking as a parent who has one child who just began grade 1, another child who will be starting kindergarten next year. I'm deeply troubled by this government's lack of support for education, particularly for public education, and I think we're seeing an attack on all fronts with respect to that. But, again, we live in a bizarro world where it's clear that we have repeated about the school boards, we have all the facts and figures to show that education funding has been cut, but because they kept one budget line item the same, they get to stand up and say that education funding has been maintained, which is factually inaccurate when we know that there are so many other lines to education funding and they've cut three significant grants to education. It's not addressing enrolment growth. We know that. That is factual as well.

I could probably speak at length about how this education system is being undercut and is really being handicapped by this government, but let's talk about what's in Bill 21, which is the handicapping of our postsecondary system. This is just again a continuation of the attack on education overall, on Albertans that this government is making, certainly by removing the cap on tuition, which they've done through this bill, increasing the interest rate that young people or any person, actually, in their life who's seeking postsecondary will pay on their student loans, and cutting education and tuition tax credits.

It appears that this government seems to be deeply afraid of educating Albertans, and I'm not sure why that fear is there. I certainly know that it is very short-sighted purely from an economic perspective, because when we invest in education, whether it be in a child who's three years old or four years old or in the education system in K to 12 and then going on to postsecondary, we know that we all reap the benefits of an educated population. Yet this government seems intent to make it as difficult as possible for Albertans to actually be educated, to succeed, to contribute in meaningful ways to the economy. Perhaps it's the critical thinking skills that this government is most afraid of, but they certainly do not seem to be supporting postsecondary.

I can tell you from my own personal experience that my family was not able to contribute to my postsecondary education in its entirety. They certainly did contribute as they could for my first couple of years of my undergraduate degree, but from that point on I was on my own, and I certainly incurred a significant level of student debt in order to complete my undergraduate degree and then to go on to complete my law degree. I took on that debt myself, and I have only been able to pay it off, after practising law for 13 years, last year. That was the challenge that I took on.

9:30

I recall, when I moved from the University of Alberta, where I did my undergraduate degree – and this was in the late 1990s, early 2000s – that there was a lot of discussion under the former Progressive Conservative governments about increasing tuition, and postsecondary students rallied against this because they understood, as we all should, that postsecondary education should not be something that's available only to those who can afford it or who can take on the significant debt that is required to get it. They believed that we all benefit and that everybody should have equitable access to postsecondary education.

I moved on to my law degree at the University of Toronto, which was an interesting experience because I found myself surrounded by postsecondary students who were a little bit different from the ones that I was around at the University of Alberta. Particularly, a number of my fellow students in law school came from very wealthy families. They came from families that had a long history of lawyers and large, very reputable law firms, former judges, all that, very wealthy families. I'll never forget within my first week or so . . . [interjection] I just want to pause one moment because, you know, it's very clear that when the Government House Leader enters a room, he always likes to make his presence known, so perhaps I could acknowledge it on Hansard since he needs so much attention.

Going back to my experience at the University of Toronto, I remember being quite struck by the fact that I was in law school, and there was a significant tuition increase that was actually instituted in my first year of law school. In fact, law school tuition that year actually tripled, and that was a decision that was made by the University of Toronto because they decided they wanted to compete with American-style law schools. I won't get into that. One of the moments that really stuck out to me was when I was having a discussion with some of my fellow law students about the increase in tuition. I'd just come from a climate of a lot of students who really cared about equitable access to postsecondary. I was quite struck by what a number of students said. I remember this because I was so shocked to hear it. One of them actually point-blank said: you know, if you can't afford to go to law school, I don't think people should. I thought: wow, what an enormous amount of privilege behind that statement, the idea that only those who could afford to go to the most expensive law school in the country should go.

I thought: hmm, is that what we're trying to do here, trying to ensure that only those who are wealthy can afford to go to postsecondary education? Not only is that short-sighted, not only is that inequitable, not only does that increase barriers to people who are already marginalized – individuals with disabilities, indigenous groups, women, persons of colour, who traditionally face greater barriers to access postsecondary – but it also demonstrates that there was a sense that . . .

Chair's Ruling Reading from Documents

The Deputy Chair: Given your invitation to the House with regard to all members perhaps reading in correspondence that they may or may not have received, I'll just take this quick opportunity to remind members that "a speech should not . . . consist only of a single long quotation, or a series of quotations joined together with a few original sentences." I think that applies to all of us, and if you have any questions on that, I think Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, page 152 at, I believe, paragraph 496, is a starting point on that.

Debate Continued

The Deputy Chair: Are there any hon. members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: My apologies. In a previous statement I might have actually said St. Albert when I in fact meant Edmonton-Whitemud. My correction.

Hon. Member for St. Albert, please continue.

Ms Renaud: Yeah. I just certainly have a lot of things to say about this bill, but I so enjoy sitting next to the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, and I would actually love to hear more about what she has to say. I think it's incredibly fascinating to have that insight in your postsecondary journey and to hear why changes like this are so devastating, actually, to people that are perhaps marginalized for whatever reason.

With that, I will take my seat.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud has risen.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Chair, and thank you to the Member for St. Albert for inviting me to finish my comments. I simply wanted to reiterate that I think that any postsecondary system which approaches it as though only those who can afford to go, which, let's be honest, is very few people – very few people have thousands of dollars at their disposal, especially when they're just coming out of the school system and now don't even have access to things like, say, the STEP program to actually earn some money and to get some internship and experience in a field that they're interested in.

The idea that postsecondary should be inaccessible: I thought that was simply an outrageous statement that came from those with extreme privilege, but now I see that it actually seems to be the guiding principle of this government. It's not that I believe that all the members within the government have the enormous wealth to be able to afford education, but I do believe that they're trying to make it more difficult for average Albertans to be able to access postsecondary.

You know, I appreciate that there absolutely should be levels of responsibility that are taken on by individuals when they choose to go to postsecondary, and I don't think that anybody is asking that postsecondary should be completely free at this point for any individual seeking it. Certainly, I think that most students go to postsecondary expecting to take on some costs and perhaps, if they don't have family support to pay for it, expecting to take on some level of maybe personal debt. But we don't need to make it more difficult, we don't need to make it onerous, and we don't need to make it crippling.

I'm particularly struck by the students who have already entered into fields of study, who have committed themselves in some respects to taking on a four-year program. If you're going into law school or med school, you're looking at seven years, you know, and you're looking at residencies and articling. It's an extreme investment of your life. To find out midway through, as many students currently will and currently have, that suddenly the very program that they're in is now unaffordable for them and to have leave midstream – the question is: where are those young people going to go? We know that this government hasn't created any jobs. Certainly, to say that they're simply now going to not be able to afford to complete their program – I'm really concerned for those young people. I know that a lot of them actually live in my riding. A lot of families within my riding certainly can and do support their adult children when they can, but even with some family support it is an expensive endeavour to go into postsecondary.

Now this government is simply saying: take on more. Essentially, the lesson and the message that I'm actually hearing from this government is: if you can't afford it, don't take it. I don't think that that as government policy actually serves our province well. It certainly does not serve us to have individuals who haven't completed their postsecondary, who can't access postsecondary. It certainly does not serve our economy well. It doesn't help us to actually invest in the future.

We're seeing a strategic and intentional attack on education, whether it be for a young child or up to postsecondary. To what end, Mr. Chair? That's what I ask this government: to what end? All we're going to do is pay the price for that. I'm deeply disappointed to see that this government does not invest in education in any form, from young children up to postsecondary, and it seems to take a very short-sighted view of their role as government.

Government's job is actually to invest in the long-term health of the province, not to score cheap political points, not to call out every organization and entity which disagrees with their approach and label them as enemies, whether it be professors, whether it be academic institutions, whether it be postsecondaries. We're seeing that approach. They've attacked our school boards. They're attacking child care providers. They're attacking – well, frankly, even Moody's now, apparently, is a target of this government. I think it's again a very short-sighted view of our province but also of their role as government.

I'm deeply disappointed by Bill 21 and its attack on postsecondary. I thank you for the time, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung has risen to speak.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the opportunity this evening to rise and speak to Bill 21. I've had a lot of enjoyment listening to speakers so far this evening who have brought forward many, many cogent arguments and brought new issues to light with respect to the consequences of implementing Bill 21. One might ask if it was necessary at all. Was this legislation necessary? One heard predictions of the UCP prior to the last election as to what their fiscal program might actually end up being like, in particular one I'm reminded of from the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul when he famously said, about the UCP's upcoming election platform and budget, prior to the election: it's going to hurt. Indeed, that prognosis has come to light, but it does beg the question: was it necessary? I say the answer is no. It wasn't necessary.

I think that if you look at the simple framework of the budgetary proposals by the government and the now opposition NDP, one will see perhaps some light as to why the government decided to go with an austerity budget. Now, the difference between the two as far as their end goals or where they end up at the end of their first term is very small. There are quite a few similarities. For example, if you look at the two proposals, the NDP proposal would have ended up with a balanced budget about one year later than the UCP fiscal plan, with about $2 billion more in debt, yet the NDP proposal would not have contemplated any of these horrific reductions in social services that this UCP has now foisted upon the Alberta population.

We're fleshing out the consequences of this by debating Bill 21 and Bill 20 tonight. I think it's pretty clear, in my view, that the pain that's being caused by this Bill 21 and the measures in the UCP budget that go beyond Bill 21 was totally unnecessary. It begs the question: why? Why did they decide to make it hurt when it was really so totally unnecessary and they're arriving at a similar location when it comes to balancing-the-budget time frame and the amount of debt at the end of one term? The only answer that I can come up with, Mr. Chair, is that it's totally political, that the UCP decided to do it as a measure of creating their own particular form of chaos, and it turns people against each other. That's what they wanted to do, reward their proponents, reward their supporters, and punish those who would oppose them, although there seem to be large exceptions to that, in and of itself. I question their motivations. I don't understand.

For example, when we look at the small-town policing measures, which are really quite current today, where it's been announced, as part of Bill 21's regulations, that the cost of small-town, rural policing – a new funding model will force them to raise taxes. Now, this government is very proud to claim that it's the champion of rural Alberta and that they're the only ones who listen to rural Alberta, yet the small-town mayors, who are those that will be suffering the costs of policing, which they didn't have to do before this government came into power, are quoted in the Star today as saying that they will end up having to raise taxes to pay for these 500 more RCMP constables that the Minister of Justice announced today.

I'm wondering what in the world small-town mayors are thinking about now when it comes to the attitude that this government is displaying towards rural municipalities and forcing them, those with populations under 5,000, to now become responsible for paying for their policing costs. These communities, according to the Star article, which I will table at the next opportunity, Mr. Chair, will start paying 10 per cent of their policing costs next year, 15 per cent in 2021, 20 per cent in 2022, and 30 per cent in 2023. Mel Smith, the mayor of Redwater, is saying: "It's going to have to be made up someplace, and we don't believe we have enough services that we could cut to cover it. So taxes and utilities have to go up to cover it." That's what the Redwater mayor, Mel Smith, has said. He said that the costs will equate to about $262,000 a year by 2023 for his town of 2,300 residents northeast of Edmonton. That means a 10 per cent tax hike to residents, to ratepayers in the town of Redwater. "It's troublesome," Mr. Smith said. "They're just downloading . . . None of the small communities can afford it."

According to the mayor of Redwater, he really feels abandoned by this government, one who championed themselves as the defenders of rural Alberta and small communities. Yet the government has chosen to download these costs, saying: "Yes, indeed, we're going to get you the rural policing needs and requirements that you've been talking about. We've been listening to you. We consulted with you. Here are 500 police officers. Oh, by the way, here's the bill." That, indeed, is sort of a bait-and-switch kind of proposal, if you ask me.

I think that all rural municipalities probably are sharing the sentiments of the mayor of Redwater when they look at what in the heck just happened in the government's response to their pleas for more rural policing supports: "Sure, you can have more police, but you're going to pay for them yourself." Out of that tax base, rural communities are going to have to come up with the dollars, in escalating amounts over the next few years, to pay for these police that they've been promised by this Justice minister in response to crime rates that they wish to significantly reduce and control.

Every small town in rural Alberta has difficulties, and we wonder or I wonder particularly about how this is going to help small towns collaborate in their efforts to look at the services they offer their citizens and find a means of synergistically putting things together in a co-operative way, because that's what's necessary on a regional basis in rural Alberta to make sure that these smaller towns and farming communities can survive over the long term. This downloading of costs for rural policing onto Alberta's rural communities seems to be part of a pattern or a theme of making sure that collaboration can't happen, because what, in fact, has happened on top of this Bill 21, one element of which is the downloading of these policing costs, is also an element of added costs to small-town communities, in that they don't have the opportunity to adjust services to find the money to pay for these extra costs.

The downloading is being done really in an effort to help the race to the bottom that the government seems to want the communities to engage in by, for example, allowing them, in other measures that they've introduced, to compete taxwise. So they can offer tax incentives to industry and businesses to locate in their town versus the town next door, and that indeed, of course, limits their tax base. Now, on top of having to compete with each other for investment in their communities, they're being told that they have to come up with a significant amount of cash, up to a 10 per cent tax hike for the town of Redwater, in order to pay for police, which heretofore have been covered by the province. This sleight of hand by the province is not something that's appreciated by these rural communities.

That's also something that Wally Yachimetz, the mayor of Calmar, adds his voice to, in the same article in the Star, where he talks about a town of 2,200 southwest of Edmonton, a town I'm also familiar with. He said that the added costs will mean a reduction of services. Thank you very much to the government. We're going to get a couple of more police officers in Calmar, but it's going to mean that something else is going to go. He goes on to say:

"More than likely there's going to be an increase (in taxes). Unfortunately, it's going to be passed along to the rate payer," Yachimetz said.

He said by the time Calmar is paying 30 per cent in 2023, the town might have to consider launching its own police service like Taber, Camrose and Lacombe.

Perhaps that's what the government wants to do overall, create a situation where the RCMP in Alberta, with their proud history in this province, somehow get squeezed out. I know this trial balloon has been floated before in the province, about getting rid of the RCMP in Alberta and perhaps forming our own police force, but it met with large opposition. I caution the government members to be pretty careful when playing around with the RCMP and their proud tradition of service in Alberta.

I happen to be familiar with many RCMP constables. My sister is the proud spouse of a retired RCMP constable who for 25 years served proudly across Canada, and through his career I watched the high level of respect and the integrity that they had in serving their communities, particularly in small towns where sometimes they were the only officer on duty in the dead of night, doing their job. There's a great deal of respect and collegiality between not only the administrators of these small communities and the RCMP who provided policing services but also the townspeople. They would rotate in and out; they wouldn't be there for a huge number of years. But I know all the postings that my brother-in-law had in small-town Alberta: in Mayerthorpe, for example, for a few years and in Stony Plain for a while, at the airport. Those relationships were long-lasting and still exist with communities that he used to be posted at. They mean a lot to townspeople, who have a lot of respect for the long tradition and the dignity of the RCMP and their police service.

If we end up with more and more smaller towns, as suggested by the mayor of Calmar, finding that it's more cost-effective or that they just don't have any choice – it is a cheaper alternative, and they can't afford it otherwise because their tax base won't support it – except to go with a small-town police force, I think that indeed, by a method that perhaps Albertans hadn't contemplated, this government is starting to push the RCMP out of policing in Alberta and somehow diminishing them in the eyes of Albertans. I think what they're trying to do is to build a case to get rid of the RCMP in Alberta and implement a provincial police force in the province.

I think we'd better have a conversation about that. I know that the government wants Albertans to talk about this proposal, and I hope that they do loudly and clearly tell them that we're proud of the RCMP in this province, that we want them to remain as our police force. I mean, 30 per cent of that money is coming from the federal government, and all that infrastructure, all the, I guess, compounded abilities of the RCMP, because they are a national police force, with tremendous resources and economies of scale – we shouldn't be dispensing with them lightly. It concerns me a lot that this government seems to be on track to promoting the creation of a provincial police force when, in fact, there is a large degree of support embedded in Alberta for the RCMP and their policing efforts in rural Alberta. So a caution there.

I also want to speak a little bit about the difficulty and the long-standing efforts of small communities to maintain a rural doctor, a country doctor. I have spoken in this House before about the efforts of my grandparents, my grandmother in Thorhild in particular, who was a village councillor and the deputy mayor there, to keep a country doctor in town or actually to attract another one after one had left. I know that they actually bought the house that the doctor had resided in and had a clinic in in an effort to maintain it and rent it out to, hopefully, a new doctor.

Also, as an added bonus, what they tried to do, because this is what they heard a doctor would be attracted to, was that they brought in an X-ray machine to be put in the basement of that house as well. I actually was one of those individuals in my father's pickup truck going to Clyde, Alberta, to pick up this old X-ray machine from, actually, a veterinary office in Clyde, to take it, with my grandfather and father, to the country doctor's home and get it set up in the basement of that house so it would be part of a clinic that would attract a doctor. In fact, that actually ended up working. I'm not sure how we got that X-ray machine onto the truck – it was a pretty heavy machine – and down into the basement, but we managed it. That country doctor used that X-ray machine to great advantage in Thorhild for a number of years. That's the type of singular effort that village people and townspeople in rural Alberta will go to to attract a country doctor.

One of the things that the government is doing in an effort to get more family doctors to choose to practise in rural Alberta is using the practitioners' ID to dictate where new graduates might practise. It is something that we heard loud and clear as the ND opposition delegation, who heard from a number of student doctors, MDs, about to come to enter the practice of medicine in this province from the University of Calgary and the University of Alberta. We heard loud and clear that they thought this was a terrible move and that there was a much better way of going about attracting doctors to practise in rural Alberta, using an incentive program rather than a dictatorial program. Many spoke about how when they did finally graduate and were going to enter into practice in Alberta, they weren't young students. They were people with families and spouses and houses. Getting the demand that they relocate to a rural location in order for them to get their practice IDs, the numbers which they need to practise, is something which has given them great pause. They are looking at potentially going to practise outside of the province rather than be told that they have to go to a rural practice.

Now, this isn't because some of them really dislike rural practices. They have perhaps spouses with a professional career going on, and they're in the middle of it, and they may be in an urban centre. It would be totally ridiculously costly for them to uproot and leave that other spouse's career behind to enable them to follow the dictates of the government and practise in a rural location. There can be parental issues, where there are elderly parents who are in a municipal area that the newly minted graduate doctor wants to practise in so that they can look after elderly parents. This would destroy the ability to do that, and consequently many were thinking: okay, I may not be able to practise in Alberta. There are situations where the practitioner just simply grew up in Edmonton or Calgary or Red Deer and wants to serve the community they grew up in as well.

There are also situations where an existing practitioner wants to sell their practice and they're now faced with a limited market.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 21? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has risen to speak.

Ms Ganley: Okay. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I have had the opportunity to speak to this bill before and made comments on many sections of it. I actually think it's interesting that I remain having more to say about it, mostly because this is a bill that in my view ought to have been many, many more bills than just one bill. It touches on such a broad breadth of different things, seemingly unrelated. I have had the opportunity to speak about increases to tuition in public education, which I think is definitely a concern. I've had the opportunity also to speak about sort of some of the health things, some of the impacts to benefits for seniors and for the disabled.

I'd like to speak about policing, which I will raise again, but I'd like now to speak a little bit about the changes to the Employment Standards Code. I suspect – and many of my colleagues have commented on this as well, but I think it's worth putting on the record – that one of the things that this bill deals with in its section 6 is amendments to the Employment Standards Code. One of the things it does is allow cabinet, by way of regulation, to alter the definition of an employee. It doesn't really sound like a big deal, but actually it has massive consequences for the population because in order to get access to a lot of the things under the Employment Standards Code, in order to get access to the right to severance, to the right to be paid for your work, to access the Employment Standards office to complain if you haven't been paid your overtime or you haven't been paid your severance or you haven't been paid your vacation pay, you need to be an employee.

Allowing cabinet to alter the definition of employee by way of regulation means that they can exclude people from those rights; entire categories of people can be excluded from those rights. I think that that is a pretty big deal.

Certainly, we saw that happening actually just today with another bill, with Bill 26, a similar move to exclude people from the operation of the Employment Standards Code. What that does, practically, for a lot of employees when they're put out of reach of the Employment Standards Code, is that it kind of removes the ability for them to get paid. That's a bit of a concern to me because a pretty fundamental principle that we all share, I would say, on both sides of the House in this place is a view that people ought to be remunerated for their work. We may disagree about what the minimum wage should be and what the impact of minimum wage policy is, owing, I think, to our rather different views of trickle-down economics, but I think we all agree that if someone works, they should be paid. In fact, I think the principle that we should be able to force people to work and to not pay them, well, there's a name for that. I can't really say it here, but I think that that should be a big concern for all of us, the idea of people working without getting paid.

I just wanted to highlight that this ability for cabinet to exclude people from being employees, to basically exclude them from the operation of the Employment Standards Code, is a huge concern. Yes, I think we discussed that at length yesterday, so perhaps I won't go on in detail, but I did want to get it on the record.

One of the other things that I'd like to comment on are some of the changes to policing. It's actually interesting. In this bill cabinet is given the ability to alter the way a rural community is paid for policing. In fact, there were all sorts of rumours circulating because the government had circulated documents saying that up to 70 per cent of the costs would now be borne by rural municipalities. It wasn't really clear what was going to happen with that.

Today we have heard an announcement from the Minister of Justice, also the Member for Calgary-Elbow. In the spirit of the awards given out earlier by the Speaker's office, I must say he deserves the award for best magic trick: making municipal residents' money disappear. I think you know that portion is definitely a concern, particularly in light of the fact that the government has gone on and on about these wasteful municipalities, that they're wasting money, blah, blah, blah, and then they foist $200 million in costs onto them that they have to recoup from their population, therefore forcing them to raise municipal taxes. Essentially, the Minister of Justice raised taxes on rural residents and then will point and laugh at the municipal councillors who are involved. I think that's just a bit disingenuous, perhaps.

Another section that concerns me, particularly being a resident of Calgary, is changes to section 13. In fact, on that I have an amendment to propose, so I will hand that over and wait for it to reach the table before I continue.

The Deputy Chair: If the hon. member would please read it into the record. Going forward this amendment, for the benefit of the House, will be referred to as amendment A5. Please continue.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I propose on behalf of my hon. colleague from Calgary-Buffalo that Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, be amended by striking out the proposed sections 13(1) and 13(2). What this does is that it removes a section of the bill and what the bill does. The sections we're removing are 13(1) and 13(2). Section 13(1) reads: "The Provincial Offences Procedure Act is amended by this section." Section 13(2) reads: "Section 14(3) is amended by adding 'or to fund programs that support or improve the administration of justice or government initiatives' after 'arising under any enactment'."

It doesn't sound like much, but what it actually does is – so currently when municipalities give out tickets to individuals who are speeding, it's usually enforced by way of police. Those police regulate how those tickets can be given out. They're responsible for safety planning and ensuring that those things are done in the right way. They get the majority of that revenue because they are doing the work of the enforcement and the safety, which is fair.

The provincial government has always taken a share of that revenue. That share was, as outlined in this section, "to offset the expenses incurred by the Crown with respect to the collecting of penalties, fines, sums of money or forfeitures arising under any enactment." Essentially, they were allowed to keep some portion of that because the courts are used as the enforcement mechanism, so they have to have justices of the peace and prosecutors and all that sort of thing to take care of these offences. They were able to retain a certain portion of this.

Interestingly, this had actually changed under the previous Conservative government just before we came in. Historically, the province had taken 16.67 per cent – I know, weird number; I didn't come up with it – of the ticket revenue. Then the Conservatives who were in shortly before we arrived had sort of built into changes in the budget that the ticket prices themselves would increase. So everyone would pay more for the same amount of speeding, if that can be defined in that way, and the provincial government would retain 26.67 per cent, an additional 10 per cent, which actually didn't make a huge amount of difference to municipalities because the ticket prices had gone up so much that the amount of revenue for the same sort of general amount of catching of speeders or catching of other people violating laws in that way remained the same. That amount of police funding flowing to municipalities stayed the same because even though the provincial government was taking a little bit more, the pie had grown as a result of the increase in fines.

Now what we see is that they're taking it even further; we're going from 26.67 per cent of fine revenue to 40 per cent. That is a significant increase, especially when you consider the history of this matter, and there's no corresponding increase in terms of the ticket revenue. What this means is that municipalities will get less. That money: it has certainly always been my understanding the entire time I was in government that that was police funding. We considered it when we calculated how much we fund police throughout the province. That money was included. When we calculated how much we funded each municipality, when we calculated how much we were giving for police, that money was included. In fact, for an urban municipality, like, for instance, Calgary or Edmonton, that money constitutes a very significant proportion of the funding that the province gives to municipalities to support policing. This is a significant cut. In fact, our chief of police in Calgary, again from my experience because it's where I live, has indicated that this will result in 130 fewer positions.

I think that's a big concern because it's actually my view – we've had this conversation a lot in this House. I know the Minister of Justice doesn't like statistics or doesn't think that they're accurate or reflective, which is his right, I suppose, but we had seen in 2017 crime rates rising in rural municipalities. We had therefore taken steps to implement a rural crime reduction strategy, and that strategy was having an effect. We were seeing some comedown. Now, of course, when you're talking about numbers that cover the entire province, that won't speak to everyone's individual experience – of course it won't – because, you know, that reduction will not be evenly spread over the province, so some areas will be differently affected.

Well, it was my view, you know, shortly before we left government, and I suspect the minister still has access to these numbers, that actually there were concerns with crime beginning to increase in cities as well, and I think we're going to see that come out in the statistics. I don't know yet because the statistics, especially like the good, centralized ones from the government, tend to have a lag time. We don't have those numbers yet, so we don't know yet what those numbers will be, but certainly the word from people around in the city, the word from people I've talked to, is that there are concerns. In Calgary, certainly, my hon. colleague from Calgary-McCall has raised with me multiple times that there are huge concerns about gangs and gun violence in his area of the city.

I think it's a problem, and I think that this is not a great time to be cutting police funding, particularly when we're cutting that funding to basically create a slush fund, because what this does, by saying "or government initiatives," is that it takes away any collars on what that money can be used for. There's no longer a restriction on what that money can be used for. It can just be used for anything. So money that was previously earmarked for policing can now – you know, it's taken from municipalities, and it can now be spent on anything.

That's a big concern. That is the reason that I am moving this amendment. I think that section is a concern to me. I think it's a concern to some other folks. With that, I will simply urge all members to vote in favour of the amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has risen on amendment A5.

Mr. Madu: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I rise not just on behalf of myself as the Minister of Municipal Affairs but also on behalf of my colleague the Hon. Doug Schweitzer, the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

An Hon. Member: Name. No.

Mr. Madu: My apologies. I apologize, Mr. Chair.

Mr. Chair, obviously I will be opposing this amendment. The simple reason is that, you know, we have heard a lot of submissions from the members opposite that this is a direct cut to police funding by the government. Let's be clear. It is not all municipalities that fund their police services from this particular source of revenue. If one or two municipalities out there decide to base their entire or a large portion of their police funding on a source of revenue that they know they are not entirely responsible for or own, whilst I understand those concerns, the truth of the matter is that just as we are responsible for our own budget, municipalities are responsible for their own budgets as well. This is a case where, you know, we have 341 municipalities across this province, and you can just count a couple that use this source of revenue to fund their police services.

I am optimistic and hopeful as the Minister of Municipal Affairs that our municipal partners will be able to find the revenue to be able to fund police, especially given the fact that the provincial government has not reduced by one penny the police grants that we provide to our municipalities. We have always been clear. Any time I hear that a politician wants to go to essential services as the first place to go to for a cut – let's be clear – that right there is a political statement. I mean, it has nothing to do with so much of the issue at stake.

We have been going through a difficult time in this province. We are asking all of us to look inwards for efficiencies. For me, you know, it is frustrating to hear some of our municipal partners resort to, as a first response, that we are going to cut funding for policing or fire services or front-line workers. That in itself tells me that there is something much more that they are pursuing rather than wanting a truthful and transparent and blunt conversation about the issue at stake.

Again, to be brief, this is not an amendment I am prepared to support. I am sure that if the Minister of Justice were here, he would not support this amendment either. So on that particular business I am going to urge all of my colleagues to vote down this amendment. We will be prepared to continue this conversation with our municipal partners as to how best we fund all of the core and priority services that the people of this province rely on. Mr. Chair, I urge the members of this House to vote down this amendment.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

On amendment A5, do I see any other members wishing to speak? Seeing none.

[Motion on amendment A5 lost]

The Deputy Chair: Moving back to Bill 21, are there any members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadows has risen.

Mr. Deol: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure once again to rise to speak to the bill, Bill 21. Just reading today's newspaper, as opposed to what the hon. minister has quoted through you, these small communities are reacting.

This bill is proposing downloading the cost of policing. This question has been raised many times by my fellow members, and the government members keep denying that this information is true. Looking at the Star newspaper today, it's not only one community; it's a number of communities. The mayors from Redwater, Calmar, Bon Accord, and a number of those other communities, small communities, you know, are denying the facts of the information. The government members have been claiming for days and months that the information is not true, that small communities will not be picking up the cost of the increased policing.

This is more concerning as this was one of the key promises by the governing party during the election. They ran an election on, you know, controlling crime in rural communities, and just seven months later it seems like they have forgotten their promise. You can call this promise made, promise broken. In small communities mostly in the of 2,000 to 3,000, 3,500 range in population, the mayors state that the communities will shut services to compensate the policing. That is not the option for many small communities as they don't have many services they can choose from to pay for the policing. The mayor said that the community will be bearing the cost: 10 per cent next year, 15 per cent after that, 20 per cent after that, and then about 30 per cent by 2023. This is quite a big cost for communities with a population of 2,000 members. That is something I understand, that the government members really understand, that this is indeed quite a heavy cost for those small communities, and that's probably why every time the question was raised, they were reiterating that this is not true information. This is quite a concerning move that cannot be supported and is itself one of the biggest reasons why we are opposing the bill.

I tried not to be so biased. So many of my colleagues have, you know, shared the concerns that we are hearing from our constituents and not only in our ridings. Many members from other parts of the province – and you will probably hear more when you go back home this week or after this week. People are concerned. People are really concerned. The Member for St. Albert shared some of the stories. The purpose of sharing those stories is to bring the feedback that we're hearing from people, sharing the experiences that we are having, the chance to meet people, the chance to do the job that we were assigned seven months ago to do.

I just wanted to share my experience. I was one of the members selected by the LAO to participate with my colleague the Member for Calgary-Glenmore in the Westminster parliamentary procedures and process. One of the key factors that we both really were, you know, engaged in: how to make the parliamentary system more effective; what mechanisms you could use to serve the people of your jurisdiction better, to make this world better for all. That is something we were discussing there even from, you know, the different spectrums, the different stripes of the politics we were from. Every time we're sharing the stories, that is the purpose. We expect – like, the government has resources – that they would have done their homework on this when they proposed these changes. Even after that – we're trying to bring those experiences, that first-hand information – they're moving forward to pass these bills when the members are aware what kind of effects they're going to make on communities.

When we were talking about deindexing the AISH benefits, it's not really fear and smear. This is not really to pick one individual. This is to share the concern that this is the wrong path we are choosing. We are open-hearted on so many other things when it comes to spending billions of dollars. The companies, we know – there in the newspaper today, last week, before that – have taken the benefits of millions of dollars. Let's say that the government members honestly believe that one day that will have the better outcome, but in this case we understand the effects of inflation. The government never claimed that they have, you know, developed the mechanism or formula to control inflation, that Alberta will not, you know, experience inflation going forward. So deindexing anything has adverse effects on the people that it's related to.

In this case all those people we're talking about are the most vulnerable communities. Those are special-needs people, the people on AISH, the seniors. And these days it's not even possible for seniors without family – I will not say, like, every senior probably, but I will generalize. In most cases seniors don't really live luxury lives. The people on AISH: you know, my colleague literally read a letter from someone about how they are budgeting their month. Basically, we were so confident. We had a plan that was going to balance the budget. We had a plan that was going to pay the debt. We had a plan that was going to create jobs. I don't know why we are so – I don't know which word I should pick. We are going after $20, we're going after $30 on those very people. There are some of the changes, you know, that I have to learn even. Henson trust funds. What are we trying to achieve by attacking those people?

I'm not really up here to make a political speech. I'm really concerned. If somebody has a background so that you can explain it, I'm willing to listen, I'm willing to participate, I'm willing to compromise on behalf of my constituents, but this does not seem to be a fair path that we are going to take. It's a wrong example that we're setting when we're claiming that we have a plan to do better. This is not something to do better. This is something very small, I understand, but those are very vulnerable communities. It's the wrong example. Please look back and think about it, the impact this is going to have. This will make their life harder.

For the members of those communities, it's not even possible to live independently on the fixed income that they're limited to. I dealt with seniors. I'm dealing with seniors. Currently I'm dealing with cases where those people, you know, are looking to move to seniors' homes, lodges. The approximate cost of those facilities: that starts around $2,000, $2,100. That is the minimum cost. That's where they start from. The majority of those people don't make that.

If we are not able to address AISH in this tough time, I would think the government member would say: "Not this year; probably next year. Yes, these are the communities in our focus. We will make this place better for everyone." But this is not the case. That is why every time, when it comes to speaking to these bills, unfortunately, we have to speak against these bills.

There is something else related to the doctors. I will leave it at this time. The president of the AMA has written a letter. I have the letter, so I will not go in depth on this. This is something constitutionally wrong that they're trying to do, that the government will have the power not to honour the legal agreement, that they can break the legal agreement. The president had clearly written: what, then, does it mean to have the agreement if this can be broken any time you want? It's creating uncertainty. It's not encouraging the people to look at Alberta as the best place to work in.

They are concerned about rising tuition costs, 23 per cent over four years. That's quite a bit. Specifically, when we're going through the time the number of people who have graduated – I know recently among these folks one who has given up. He's moved to somewhere in Europe. He was not going to find a job. He graduated in chemical engineering from the U of A under heavy debt. He waited two years, didn't find a job, and moved. I know another person, you know, being under so much stress, who was lucky to find a job with the city. It's not in his field, but at least he has a job to do.

We are even seeing the trend where our relationship with the cities is not even on the right path. The cities are concerned that the government is changing their charters and that, by the move, they're gaining the power where they will end up probably cancelling and delaying their major projects. The fellow who got a job with the city may end up losing his job because, you know, you are trying to change the funding models to the cities.

So there are a number of things. I can go into details, like, one by one. I can spend lots of time even on each topic being addressed in this omnibus bill, but I wanted to say that it is not doing any better for anyone. The people who are giving us feedback: they are not only the people that voted for us. They are the people who voted for us; they are the people who did not vote for us. They are the people who even voted for the UCP in the past election. The people that are speaking out: I know you will listen, and I hope that it will not be too late by the time you listen.

It's my honour to rise in the House on behalf of my constituents to raise their concerns and to raise the concerns of the Albertans we heard, and with these comments, I'd just close my remarks. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has risen to speak.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I am pleased to stand tonight to share some of my thoughts and remarks on Bill 21, an omnibus piece of legislation that makes a huge number of changes on a number of different topics, pieces of legislation, creates new legislation, new acts within it, and does it across a lot of pages. I am going to try and focus some of my comments at this time to areas that touch on my critic portfolio of Labour and Immigration, but if I do have some additional time as I'm thinking of things this evening, I may also speak to some of the larger issues. Within Bill 21, the Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, there are some very large, sweeping changes that impact the collective bargaining process, that impact the rights and protections that are afforded to employees in this province and make changes to those rights and to those employees.

I'll start, Mr. Chair, by referring to the employment standards section, which is part 6 of this act, Bill 21. What the Employment Standards Code changes do is that they give the government the ability to exclude classes of individuals through regulation from being considered an employee. Now, within the Employment Standards Code, when we talk about employment standards, we are talking about the minimum employment standards protections available to workers. What seems to be the general view across Canada is that employment standards are considered that floor, the minimum protections from which all employees should benefit.

Even today in our regulations supporting the Employment Standards Code there are some exclusions, accommodations for particular industries. I would note that in Alberta those exclusions have not been reviewed in quite some time, and that was something that I certainly have spoken to the current minister of labour about in my hope that they will review that. This government should be considering employment standards, occupational health and safety, the Labour Relations Code, all of the legal frameworks that protect the rights of workers and, particularly, vulnerable workers. Rather than giving themselves the power to exclude classes of workers from those protections through Bill 26, which we have recently seen through this House, this government should be considering how to make sure that Alberta workers are protected, to make sure that Alberta workers are respected and are afforded the rights that all Canadian citizens are entitled to.

Unfortunately, Bill 21 is another move in the wrong direction because it allows this government to exclude entire classes of individuals from being considered employees. Now, if someone is not considered an employee, the potential impact of that is them not qualifying for employment standards protection. Now, I will mention that the current definition of an employee means "an individual employed to do work who receives or is entitled to wages and includes a former employee." In excluding entire classes of individuals from that definition, you are excluding classes of people from being entitled to wages. I have grave concerns about this. Now, I've reviewed the government's press releases. I've reviewed some of the government's press releases and statements throughout the course of debate through the various readings, and I have not heard a compelling argument for why entire classes of individuals would need to be excluded from the definition of employee in our Employment Standards Code, Mr. Chair. I would argue that this is a very concerning move from a government that has just recently excluded a large number of workers from basic protections, like the right to be paid, through Bill 26.

That is something that I would like to flag first and foremost, the changes in section 6 to employment standards, because it has far-reaching implications. The term "employee" is used throughout the legislation, so in changing through regulation who can fall under that category or not has massive impacts within this piece of legislation. I would submit to you, Mr. Chair, that a province and a workplace that is supportive of workers is also supportive of business. As you will hear from many business owners, many employers, they need their workers in order to prosper. I'm quite concerned about this.

I would also flag that employment standards are often relied upon by, particularly, vulnerable workers. Vulnerable workers can be considered as a number of different potential groups. That often includes new immigrants. Vulnerable workers often can include single parents, young workers. By not having that minimum floor of standards in our Employment Standards Code, the risk is that people will fall through the cracks. The risk is that people will perhaps not be paid wages and will not have any recourse because they will not have the benefits of the protections of employment standards.

I would encourage this government that, rather than finding ways to exclude people, they should be looking at the current exclusions and determining if they are appropriate or not. Given the age of this exclusion list as it stands today, it deserves thorough review and should be updated and modernized. I would mention that Alberta had roughly 85 per cent of workers covered by employment standards prior to Bill 26 passing. That percentage is likely lower. In Manitoba it is 90 per cent; in Ontario, 86 per cent. But Ontario has also started on a very deliberate process to try and include more workers in minimum employment standards protections. So right there is a big concern for me in Bill 21.

The second area that I want to mention is the changes to the Labour Relations Code. These changes directly impact the collective bargaining process, particularly under essential services agreements. Mr. Chair, essential services agreements give public-sector employees that right to strike, which had been removed from them, unconstitutionally, for many, many years. A recent Supreme Court ruling clarified that Albertans, Canadians have the right to collectively bargain, and that includes the right to strike through the enabling legislation that we have. There are a number of steps and procedures. But these are important, fundamental rights as Canadians, and that right to collectively bargain is a fundamental human right as well, codified by the ILO and other major organizations.

Now, what this government has done is that when negotiating an essential services agreement, an employer will be able to choose to use replacement workers, or strikebreakers, versus negotiating an essential services agreement with the people who work in that facility or for that employer. I would posit that that is very problematic for a number of reasons. First off, when there is a collective bargaining dispute, there is a very large power imbalance between workers and employers. One of the only powers that workers have is the right to withhold their labour through collective bargaining action, through striking. By allowing replacement workers to come in, you're undermining workers' powers when they're already at a disadvantage.

I strongly feel that as Canadians we should be respecting the right to collectively bargain. We should be respecting that process, that has been developed over centuries, because I can tell you that when there wasn't a framework to help facilitate employers and workers negotiating, it was chaos. There were a lot of major actions that took place 100 years ago. In Winnipeg the strikes of 1919, as an example, brought the city to a grinding halt for a matter of weeks. That is not what we want to see, so respecting workers and respecting the collective bargaining process is important.

But bringing strikebreakers in has a known impact of escalating tensions when there is a strike or lockout and introduces workers unfamiliar with the work environment. When we're talking about where a strike or lockout might happen in a place where there is an essential services agreement – essential services agreements are required when the employer has determined that there is work that has to be done or there would be great damage to health, to buildings, to facilities. A power generator needs to have a certain level of work happening and cannot be allowed to fail even in the case of a strike or lockout. An essential services agreement makes sure that there are workers to do that work. A health care facility: making sure that there are enough minimum workers to care for the individuals in that health care facility is what an essential services agreement is supposed to help define. Now we are inviting strikebreakers into that environment – in the case of a health care facility, a seniors' home, perhaps – people unfamiliar with the work environment, and none of the existing employees will be there.

I can tell you that strikes and lockouts only come to pass after other avenues have been exhausted. I have never spoken to a worker who did not deeply care about the work that they do, the people that they serve, the work that is happening. Negotiating those essential services agreements is incredibly important, but bringing in replacement workers or strikebreakers to perform the work of those employees who are out on the picket lines because they've been locked out or because they've chosen to go on strike is going to escalate, is going to extend the length of these disputes and removes power away from the workers in a situation where there's already a power imbalance. I strongly disagree with the changes that are happening here in the Labour Relations Code.

Now, in section 14, the Public Sector Employers Act, there are changes here that actually limit the notice of termination and severance pay that employees are entitled to, capping what a long-term employee would have the right to should they be terminated. We are talking about employees who may have worked as public servants in our government for long periods of time. The Public Sector Employers Act section is talking about limiting, capping the severance pay and changing what will happen should someone who has collected the severance find new employment in the Alberta public agencies again, including a new repayment section if someone has been terminated.

I think this is a piece of Bill 21 – there are many pieces, Mr. Chair – that has not received enough consideration through the debate, and part of that is simply because we are dealing with an omnibus piece of legislation with so many moving parts in it. I will say again that I have gone specifically to look at the government information about this bill, how this government is communicating the changes to the general public, and I find it completely lacking in detail, making it very hard for the average Albertan to understand what this bill is doing and what impact that will have on them in their working environment.

I've raised three concerns so far: loopholes and exemptions to those minimum employment standards; the power imbalance that already exists when dealing with conflict between workers and employers and the fact that adding replacement workers into the essential services agreements further shifts that power balance; and limiting the severance pay for long-term public servants who may find themselves without a job. I can tell you, Mr. Chair, that there are a lot of public servants who are quite concerned about their jobs under Budget 2019 and the language that they hear coming from this government, the letters that are being sent out to unions. We've seen a lot of those workers express their concerns through information pickets, by gathering together on the front steps of the Legislature. I certainly hope that this government is getting the sense of how strong those concerns are.

I will continue talking about part 16, the Public Service Employee Relations Act. In part 16 a number of workers are being denied collective bargaining rights, rights that were only just given to them in 2018 after much consultation. I would like to stress to you, Mr. Chair, that withdrawing or removing collective bargaining rights from groups of workers in Canada has been deemed unconstitutional in many different court decisions. It's something that any government should do very, very cautiously.

But this government seems to be doing it fairly regularly and without, in my view, enough consideration. I have not heard from the government any good reason why these classes of workers are being removed from having collective bargaining rights, something that they are entitled to through Canadian human rights, something that fundamentally the International Labour Organization and labour standards across the world suggest should be granted to all workers. But here on page 51 we are removing the collective bargaining rights from entire classes of workers again. I am in strong disagreement with that and have not heard from this government what possible justification there would be for removing those workers from that section.

Part 16, the Public Service Employee Relations Act, starts to again talk about the collective bargaining process. I have to repeat that the collective bargaining process is a right that workers have, the right to work together to negotiate as part of correcting or accommodating the imbalance of power between employers and employees. It's something that as Canadians we have said that we value, by including it in our founding, most principal documents.

Here in this section specifically, giving new powers to the minister to issue directives to employers that they must follow before, during, and after engaging in collective bargaining: now, my concerns here are not fundamentally with the minister giving directions to employers. Rather, my concern is that we are talking about essentially secret directions. It doesn't say "secret." I believe "confidential" is the language term in here. There has been case law dealing with whether partners, particularly employers at the bargaining table, can withhold certain information in the context of bargaining. So my question to the government would be: are we certain that this will stand up should workers choose to challenge the ability of the employer to have confidential or secret information influencing the collective bargaining process?

As I understand it, in a collective bargaining situation both parties need to come together in good faith to negotiate and to find that agreement. It's a system that Canadians, Albertans, workers, and employers should all respect, and here we have the government giving itself new powers of confidential data, confidential orders. If I'm not mistaken, I've seen in this section that the minister's orders can be changed during collective bargaining. I would appreciate any clarification on that section. That would be concerning because changing your bargaining position during the collective bargaining process has been deemed by the Labour Relations Board to be a bad-faith bargaining tactic in the past.

When we talk about what Bill 21 is doing to workers, there are a number of concerns that I have with this piece of legislation. On top of that would be the general concerns, that so many of my colleagues have very skilfully talked about, with changes like pausing the indexing for AISH, which my colleagues have rightfully described as a cut. The government objects to that language. I simply ask: to the AISH recipient, what is the difference between a pause and indexing being cancelled? Like, pause, cancel: it doesn't matter. When it comes to next year, the person on AISH is not going to get a cost-of-living increase while the price of goods and services will increase on that individual. We are talking about people who are surviving on very little money in this province.

The same pause has been given to the seniors' benefit, to the employment and income supports benefit. I just find the language of a pause versus cancelling to be meaningless when you are talking to the people who are receiving this money. We are calling it, rightfully, what it is, which is a cut, whereas if this change was not made, they would get more.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Do I see any other hon. members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert has risen to speak.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I would like to move an amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member. As the pages distribute this amendment, I would ask that you can start right now just by reading it into the record.

For the benefit of the House going forward, this amendment will be referred to in debate as A6.

Ms Renaud: Okay. Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's my pleasure to move an amendment to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. I move that Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, be amended in section 4 by striking out subsection 4(6); by adding the following after subsection (6):

Section 3.3 is amended

- (a) by striking out "section 3.2(1)(d)" and substituting "section 3.2";
- (b) in clause (b)(i), by striking out "Schedule 2" and substituting "the regulations"; and in subsection (7) by striking out clause (e).

Just, I guess, briefly, what we're trying to do, Mr. Chair, is to give this government one more opportunity to do the right thing as it relates to Henson trusts. We've already moved one amendment that was specific to Henson trusts. However, I believe it included another section on indexing.

However, this amendment is focused specifically on Henson trusts. I think it's really important to be very clear, for people with disabilities that are watching – and there are some – and groups or advocacy groups that have worked for many years to have Henson trusts enshrined in the AISH Act, in legislation, that they know that we're giving this government one very clear opportunity to do the right thing and to preserve the ability to have Henson trusts enshrined in law so that it's not moved to regulation, so that it's not hidden away from this place, so that any changes that are made to this will be done in the full light of the day here in this Chamber as opposed to behind closed doors or simply by the minister's office or cabinet. This is very clear. This is a second opportunity for this government to stop, to think about what they're doing, and to make a change, to make a necessary change.

Some of the members are new, and we would have had these discussions in 2018, when we debated this in this place. It was actually, I think, a private member's bill that we debated to get this work done. I know one of the groups that the government likes to talk a lot about – and they've done some great work over the years – is Inclusion Alberta. I know that before they were called Inclusion Alberta, it was the Alberta association for community living. They were very active in pushing the government of the day – that would have been the Conservatives, and then it would have been our government, the New Democrats – to look at making these necessary changes. To be clear, before we made the changes, Alberta was the only province in Canada that didn't have this protection. It was a great day, actually, when this legislation passed in 2018 and these changes were made. I do believe it passed unanimously with all of the people that were here at the time.

Now suddenly it's a different story. Now, I know that, very much like with the cuts to AISH, the government likes to say that it's not a cut because, you know, it's deindexing. Whatever. It's a cut. The big question here is: why on earth would you mess around with this? I'm hoping the Premier is not laughing at what I'm saying about Henson trusts. What I am saying is that I don't understand that, and I really wish somebody would explain it to me and perhaps explain it to Albertans that are watching and explain it to advocacy groups that would like to know: why is it that this protection for a Henson trust is being moved from legislation into regulation? Why? What is the reason? For fun? I can't imagine that people that write this stuff enjoy writing it just for fun if there are no plans at all to change it.

Not once have I heard – now, I'll be straight; I haven't been here for every single hour of debate on this – of one minister or one government member explaining to anybody why this is being done other than: "There's nothing to see here. There's nothing cut. Don't worry about it. Everything will be just fine." Well, if that is the case, why would you do this? I would appreciate it, as would Albertans, if we had a straight answer instead of the same old tired talking points that don't say anything. They don't say anything. I think the mere fact that nobody is making eye contact would probably say something, too.

But let's move on. As you know, as I'm sure the government will know, Henson trusts are actually called Henson trusts because they come from a case in Ontario. The case was the Minister of Community and Social Services versus Henson. What this suit was about was protecting assets set aside for a disabled beneficiary so that those assets would not be used to compromise eligibility for government benefits. In this case it would be AISH, but in Ontario it is not. The Supreme Court actually later weighed in and for the first time addressed this issue and affirmed the essence of these trusts. Again, as I said, in 2018 Alberta finally joined the rest of the country by protecting these things.

If you can imagine for a moment that – and I'm sure some people in this Chamber do in fact have dependants or children that have disabilities that this would impact. For whatever reason they will be unable to work as they get older. For whatever reason AISH is how they're going to support themselves. As a parent, of course, you want to ensure that their future is secure. We've already been through this for hours tonight to understand that living on AISH is living in poverty. That's just a fact. It's a fact. Surviving on AISH is tough. It's living in poverty. So parents want to know that after they're gone, they can leave a trust that will be managed by a trustee that will assist that dependent adult or their child – it's always their child, I suppose, no matter how old they get – by supporting them with that trust and that that will not impact their benefits that they rely on to pay for rent, food, and all of those things.

You can imagine the comfort that it must be to parents to know that this is something that they can do to give themselves some peace of mind by knowing that their child is taken care of. If there is absolutely no intent whatsoever to make changes to this particular ability of parents to provide for their sons or daughters or dependants, to provide them with a trust, then I have no idea why the government would feel it is necessary to move it from the act into regulation other than that they have something planned. I mean, that's the only thing I can think of.

I can't think of why the government would move things like the definition of severe handicap or eligibility or anything about the benefits – I don't know why they would feel the need to take it out of the AISH Act and put it into regulation other than that there's something going on. I've seen your budget projections for the next few years, and I know that they're not going to meet the growth in intake. So there is something going on. For whatever reason this government is choosing to deflect, to put out information that is incorrect, that is misleading, and I just don't understand why somebody from the government won't stand up and explain this. You don't just represent the people that you believe voted for you or gave you your great big mandate. You do owe explanations to every single Albertan, particularly every single Albertan who is impacted by this change.

I've got a couple of examples that I'd like to share with you. There's a friend of mine who lives in St. Albert. His name is Eric. I won't share his last name. He and his wife had one child. Her name is Jan. Jan is probably in her 50s now. Jan was born with a fairly profound developmental disability. Eric lost his wife as well and has been methodically over the years – and he only had one child – planning for the time when he will no longer be around. He's the kind of dad who – his daughter doesn't live with him – calls her every night. He knows exactly what's going on in her life. They go on regular vacations. He has peace of mind knowing that he's worked very hard and saved very hard and invested where he could to know that whatever happens to her with AISH, whatever else, you know, you choose to do in the short term, he has set up this trust, and he knows that the trustee that he has assigned will take care of her future.

But now that future is in question and in jeopardy, and the government members, the Premier, the minister will not stand up and answer any questions. If you expect Albertans to actually believe that you're making these changes for no other reason than, you know, the goodness of your heart – who knows? – it just doesn't even make sense. It's actually a bit insulting that you would think that we don't understand what you're doing or that we don't see that path. We get it. We see you. We see exactly what you're doing.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, please, through the chair.

Ms Renaud: I'll speak through the chair. Absolutely.

You know, as we get near the end of this session, I've really been hopeful that somebody would have the courage, Mr. Chair – somebody – to stand up and own their decision and explain it, not hide behind talking points that don't mean anything to anybody except, I guess, the people that wrote them and the people that speak them every day. Just answer a simple question. This is, like, a life-or-death thing. This might not seem like it to these members over here, but it is a life-or-death thing. Can you imagine somebody knowing that they will not always be here to provide for their adult daughter or son or whatever the relationship is – they will not be around – and needing to know that that person will be cared for, that they will not go hungry, that they will not have to live with four roommates because they can't afford housing, that they will not have to go to the food bank, that they will have a future where maybe occasionally they can go to the gym and work out, maybe go on a vacation once a year, every other year? Who knows? That is peace of mind that is, like, life-and-death important, and this government won't even stand up and explain to us: why on earth did you shove this thing into an omnibus bill, that is a slap in the face to Albertans to begin with? Why will you not explain?

In fact, I don't even get why the members think it's kind of funny that I get so worked up about this. But you know what? I'm worked up because I represent a lot of people who are really worked up about this, and I would like an answer if you're going to vote this down for a second time. This is the second time we're giving you the chance to fix this, to fix this dangerous error.

If you go further and change this further, there will be legal action. I think Inclusion Alberta has even been fairly clear about that. So why not fix it? Why not eliminate the confusion, eliminate the risk, give people some peace of mind, and put it back. Do the right thing. The government is taking us backwards, Mr. Chair. They're taking us backwards in almost every area, from employment, the minimum wage, to tuition, everything that you can think of, and now this.

Once again, we will be the only province that doesn't have this protection. Why? The past wasn't that great. Let's go forward to the future. Let's make it better. Let's invest in people. Let's invest in families. This is ridiculous, it's insulting, it's dangerous, and you owe Albertans an explanation.

That's all I have to say about this. Thanks.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other hon. members looking to speak? I see the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I won't spend a lot of time talking about this specific issue, but I did want to have a chance to rise on it because it is such an important issue on so many fronts.

You know, I first met the Member for St. Albert many years before she actually chose to run for us. She was an incredibly passionate advocate for people who had significant disabilities, and she was a courageous spokesperson for those people for years and years and years before she ever decided to get into politics. I first met her when the former PC government decided to try and cut roughly $40 million to $50 million away from PDD, and that advocate helped organize hundreds of people every Friday to come to the Legislature to protest the injustice of that decision. I know that she cares very deeply, and I know that when she talks about the insecurity and the fear that this change with respect to the status of Henson trusts creates in families whose loved ones are suffering from a significant disability, she speaks with nothing but genuine sincerity, and she brings to this House a sincerity that all members, were they to listen, could learn from. I'm very, very proud that she is here to stand up for people with these challenges and their families here in Alberta, and I wish people understood the privilege that they have to learn from her.

Now, the fact of the matter is that what she is proposing is to try to fix the mistake, that the minister has very intentionally allowed to persevere within this bill, such that the integrity of these trusts is safe from subsequent decisions by this government to claw back money from people who are permanently and seriously disabled in terms of the AISH money that they receive. Let me tell you that it's all fine for the folks over there to say: "Oh, no, no. We didn't mean to take it out of the legislation. We'll protect these trusts by regulation." Well, of course, it begs the question: "Why would you do that?" Secondly, the fact of the matter is that security is such a fundamental issue in the lives of families who are all coming together to provide support to a loved one who suffers from a serious disability.

Now, I know that other speakers here have talked about what it's like as a parent in those first few days and months when you bring your baby home from the hospital, unless, of course, you've had the baby at home, which many of my friends have done, which I've always thought is a little weird. I mean, it's good for them, but it's always kind of scary. Nonetheless, you have your baby, and you watch your baby. Every moment of that baby's first few days, weeks, months, years you watch them. Are they developing normally? Are they looking at me? Are they moving the way they should move? Are they getting ready to stand up? Are they crawling? All those things new parents do with love. Frankly, that is sometimes the only time you ever experience that in your life. Those parents go through that period where they slowly start to learn that maybe their baby is actually going to be struggling with more serious challenges than just whether or not they get picked first for the soccer team at school and that, in fact, things aren't unfolding exactly the way they are. I don't know if anybody here has had that feeling. It is the most scary feeling as a parent that you can ever have, to watch that with your child and not sleep night after night wondering whether the future of your child, the one that you had always imagined for them is what they will have.

Maybe it's over a few days, maybe it's over a few months, maybe it's over a few years you may come to conclude that, in fact, your child's future is not going to be the one that you had anticipated when you first decided that you were going to have a family and that your child's future is going to be different than the future that you had planned. So then as a parent what you do is that you begin to plan for how to make sure that that future is as good as it can be. You start planning very early on, and you put money aside to make sure that that child will be protected when you're no longer there to protect them.

If anybody here has spent time with families who are caring for a child, a sibling, another relative who has a serious disability, you will know that those people are heroes. Their lives have been fundamentally and foundationally changed forever. They don't vacation anymore, they don't go out for coffee with their friends, they don't plan lovely gatherings with their neighbours on the weekend – why? – because they have changed their life to make sure that they are there for their loved one whenever it is necessary, and they do that because they love their loved one. Quite frankly, that's what happens in the majority of cases, and what that means is that they are doing that and as they do that, the rest of Albertans are not doing it because these people are caring for their loved ones, which, of course, I'm sure is the value that the members opposite think is so fundamentally important. And they do that.

But they also know that they won't be there forever. Every parent from the moment that the light goes off and they realize that the future of their child is different, they begin to worry about what will happen when they're not there anymore. Even as they work ten times as hard at parenting or being a brother or a sister or an uncle or a niece or a nephew, even as they do that, so much more work, they also know that they won't always be there, so they plan for the future. They put this money aside, and they hope that it will be there to be just the smallest little bit of support for their loved one in their absence.

Let me give you some examples. Let's imagine for a moment that you have a severely autistic child, and that child actually becomes extremely comfortable living with their family, and they are able to actually secure an incredible quality of life. It's not what their family had hoped for them going forward, but they have a great quality of life. That family knows that when that family is gone, that child with autism is going to be brutally sad and broken when they are forced to live in a group home with five or six other people that don't understand who they are, what their routines are, what they need, what they like to do when they go out, all those kinds of things.

One of the things that people do with these trusts is that they use the money to make sure that there's a companion there, for instance, with that person who has a disability so that that person with the disability actually gets out into the community regularly, still gets to see and do the things that bring them joy in their life. Just as an example, that's what they do. This is about the care of these people. This is about the piece of mind of their loved ones who devote so much of their life to caring for them, and it in no way costs this government anything.

Now, what will cost this government in the long run is if they begin to nickel and dime people who are otherwise eligible for AISH because they don't in their heart think that those people should be allowed to live on $1,600 or $1,700 a month. And if they nickel and dime them such that those people become increasingly pressured, find themselves with fewer and fewer places to live, fewer and fewer types of food that they can afford, fewer and fewer winter jackets that they can afford to buy in the winter, fewer and fewer activities in the community that they can participate in, well, as that happens, slowly those people will become more marginalized, and ultimately they will cost all of us more both in terms of what we have done to our community as well as what we have done to them individually and what that means to where we will see them asking for support in other parts of what we do through government, whether it be in the health care system, the justice system, or otherwise. It doesn't help in the long term. It doesn't save money in the long term. What it also does is that it significantly hurts the hopes and dreams of many, many people who make courageous decisions to care for the people that they love most in the world. Security is such a critical part of these people's lives, knowing what they can plan for.

So if the plan is not to try and claw back this money from these families, who I've just described, why would you pass legislation that gives you the ability to do it? Don't tell us: oh, don't worry; we'll protect it in regulation. Come on. Give everybody some respect. Understand that they understand what's going on here. And if you're going to do it, come clean. If you're not going to do it because you think it's as cruel as it is, then accept this amendment and fix this so that those hundreds of thousands of families can sleep better at night. You know what? They put in 14, 16 hours a day caring for their loved ones. When they finally get to sleep, they should be able to sleep soundly. This bill is making sure that they will not. You have the ability to give them that sound sleep, or you can make them worry even more. That's your choice.

I thank the Member for St. Albert for trying so hard to give piece of mind back to these families, and I urge members of this Assembly to support her in that exceptionally worthwhile objective.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

We are on amendment A6. Are there any hon. members wishing to speak to the amendment? Seeing none.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A6 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 11:24 p.m.]

[Motion on amendment A6 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We are now moving back to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019. Are there any hon. members wishing to speak? I see the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has risen.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chair, for allowing me to rise again. I begin, of course, by expressing my profound disappointment, on behalf of the many families of people with severe disabilities in Alberta, at this government's failure to take the opportunity that the Member for St. Albert offered to them to adopt a more humane approach to supporting them in the work that they do to care for their loved ones.

You know, it's hardly surprising, honestly, because it is one small part of a bill which is troubling on a multitude of fronts. At the highest level this bill includes many, many attacks on the lives of Albertans and Alberta families in a number of different areas, and I will go through those to some degree. I know that many of my colleagues have, but certainly I, too, would like to have the opportunity to remind members opposite exactly what it is they are doing to the people of Alberta through the enactment of this bill. And to be clear, it is: to the people of Alberta. It is an attack on the people of Alberta. It is a difficult thing that is being done to the people of Alberta.

Just to put it in context, Mr. Chair, for each one of the cuts that are embedded in Bill 21, as I talk about them, it's important to examine them in the larger context: we are doing this so that we can give $4.7 billion to exceptionally wealthy corporations. You know, there's been a lot of work that's been done recently to sort of itemize where that $4.7 billion is going. Over the course of the last few weeks we've seen a number of large corporations report on exactly how much they have banked themselves as a result of the generous corporate handout that this government has adopted and decided is necessary and that they have also decided Albertans need to pay for through a series of hardships, many of which are embedded in the bill that we are speaking to today.

Today I read an article about – I think it was a combination – Exxon and Chevron. Exxon and Chevron: you know, two long-standing Alberta companies. Oh, wait. Nope. Actually, they're American multinationals. Exxon and Chevron have just managed to bank collectively roughly $670 million as a result of the corporate handout that this government thought was so critical to their economic plan, notwithstanding that we have seen jobs lost, not gained, since its monumental announcement.

You know, that is to be added up with the many other – well, not many other, actually. I think it actually adds up to about seven major American multinational companies that are getting a tremendous amount of money. A couple of Canadian ones, so good on that. CNRL, Suncor: two big companies also getting a fair amount. Other smaller ones are getting some money, too: the insurance industry, for instance, which is also at the same time successfully lobbying to be able to charge Albertans more. But that's a different issue. Lots of folks getting that money who already have money or who the members opposite plan to give more money to.

Obviously, that creates a fiscal challenge, as was identified by Moody's, the newest recruit to the ecoterrorist conspiracy, apparently, according to the Premier's latest analysis of the situation. Nonetheless, according to Moody's, because of the fact that we have cut $4.7 billion and we've failed to do anything to diversify our economy, we are creating more instability. Of course, one of the things to mitigate that, if you decide that that's the way to go, is in fact to engage in very aggressive attacks on things that matter to regular Albertans. Indeed, this government is following that formula to a T, as described in Bill 21. That's really the high-level piece that we find Bill 21 plays. We are not creating jobs; we are not growing the economy. We are creating more economic uncertainty, and we are taking money away from regular Alberta families in order to hand it over to places like Exxon and Chevron.

So how exactly does Bill 21 enumerate the cuts that will be experienced by Albertans? Well, we've just finished talking about how this government has given itself the authority to claw back money that families will have spent decades or more saving for their seriously disabled child, sibling, uncle, aunt, whoever. They've given themselves the authority to claw that money back as it relates to entitlement to AISH, so that's nice. They've also of course continued on the theme of going to the most vulnerable Albertans and the severely disabled as your go-to to find money to fund your $680 million gift to Exxon and Chevron, as reported by Bloomberg earlier today.

Who else are we going after? Well, with these folks we're also of course breaking the commitment that the members opposite made in the last election as well as in this House a very short time before the last election to ensure that indexation was a protection that these vulnerable Albertans could rely on. To be clear, just to lay this out there, indexation is not a windfall. Indexation is not a guarantee: oh, you know, you're going to earn more money next time because the government is richer, so you get a little bit more. It's not that. It is simply maintaining the same level of funding. That's all it is. Indexation means that you have the same amount of money in your pocket this year as you did last year, as you will next year, and it accounts for the ever-rising prices and challenges that people have.

Indexation is the classic form of security, and it matters the most to those who are on a fixed income and a low income. Indexation is, for instance, a feature of the pension that we know the Premier will ultimately be eligible for. It's a feature of CPP, that the UCP is very interested in playing around with. It's a long-standing principle that it's a fundamentally important provision when a society decides that the most vulnerable among us should be cared for in a humane way.

Now, we all understand the concept of a living wage. I'm assuming folks over there have accidentally stumbled on that concept at some point. Of course, the current rate of AISH is below what experts describe as a living wage, but nonetheless members opposite like to refer to it as generous. I find it a bit rich to hear people earning anywhere between $120,000 and $210,000 a year describe an allowance of about $1,650 a month as generous. I'm going to tell you, Mr. Chair, that that's a little on the rich – when people think about: you know, how does one use that little bit of irony best in speech? That's kind of where you'd likely find that in the dictionary: rich.

Anyway, this bill, of course, breaks the promise of the election, breaks the promise of the vote that we saw, the unanimous vote, where there was a considered decision by the UCP under the leadership of the then Leader of the Opposition, the current Premier: "Let's make sure that Albertans think that we are generous, kind people, so let's all vote unanimously for indexation because – don't worry – if we win, we can undo it at the first opportunity. Yeah, that's what we're doing."

If I recall correctly – and I'm happy to be corrected – our rough estimate was that based on what future expectations are with respect to inflation next year, this will amount to about $30 a month less that people will get as of January 1. The next year it will be about another $30 a month; and the next year, another $30 a month. You know, by the end of the four years we're looking at $120 a month, but as many people on this side of the House have already mentioned, according to the Premier that's not onerous for them. We beg to differ. We think it is. It is particularly onerous when it's being done to fund the $4.7 billion corporate handout, including, recently reported by Bloomberg, the $680 million that is being pocketed by Chevron and Exxon this quarter as a result of it.

Now, what else do we see in Bill 21? Well, we see skyrocketing tuition. We see the cap being taken off tuition. Now, this is wrong for a couple of reasons. When we first got elected, the combination of tuition and other fees being charged at Alberta's universities meant that Albertans were paying the highest tuition in the country. I suppose that in some ways, given that we at that point also had the highest average income, it's not necessarily completely out of line that that would have been the case, except for the fact that not everybody enjoys that higher income.

In fact, my idea of a postsecondary education is that it really is the opportunity for those people who want to do better for themselves to take that path, so it should be available for everyone, not just the people who make a lot of money. We decided that we were going to try to bring the tuition down, so we imposed the freeze. We funded the freeze, not every year but some of the years, and in so doing, we went from the most expensive to the third-least expensive over the course of four years. To be clear, one of the things that that does is that it also attracts more students to Alberta.

At the end of the day, as much as I understand that our oil and gas and nonrenewable resources are a tremendous resource for Alberta – they have been in the past, and they will be in the future – and an opportunity to grow and build our economy, the biggest resource that Albertans have right now, which arguably is at greater risk than our ability to maximize the value from our oil and gas resources, is our human resources. We have the youngest population and the best-educated population in the country. We have people flocking to Alberta. If what happens instead is that our young people start going to postsecondary in other provinces, they may not come back. Then we will start to lose that, and we'll start to have sort of the demographic outlook that you see in the Maritime provinces.

I know that when I was Premier, I used to talk with my colleagues in the Maritimes and think: jeez, you guys have a tough row to hoe in terms of growing your economy, growing your revenue, and fixing your fiscal challenges because, you know, all the factors are against you, and your demographics are very much against you. It is the opposite for Alberta. We have tremendous opportunity, but we won't if we push those people out.

The other thing is that it's also costing more for those families who are looking at trying to help their kids find that future that is so clearly offered through a postsecondary education. Of course, that cost is being added to because we've also cancelled the tuition tax credit that those families or their kids relied on. That's worth thousands of dollars to those families, and that's gone as well. Also, when these kids, as a result of higher tuition and the absence of the tuition tax credit, have to expand the borrowing that they engage in in order to go school, they also now have to pay more interest.

All in all, we've decided: "Yeah, you know what? Postsecondary education is not for everybody. No. We're going to make sure that it's mainly for those who can afford it so that, you know, those who have money get to keep it and those who don't have even fewer opportunities to get it." That is the view, I think, of what a good society looks like when it comes to the folks across the way.

Now, we've talked about disability income. We've also now seen a needless attack on the mobility of physicians, which is embedded in this bill. You know, I understand that there are a lot of complexities. I'll be quite frank with you. There are tremendous complexities in terms of the relationship between the government of Alberta and the physicians in Alberta. Many of them are challenges that, frankly, are a hangover from agreements and relationships that were negotiated by the previous Conservative government in 2012-13, I believe it was. They do provide huge complexities. There's a lot of work to be done to try to undo some of the challenges that were created by the rather hapless handling of that file.

But what I will say is that you're not going to fix the problem by once again breaching people's constitutional rights and creating yet another law firm unless, of course, private-sector lawyers are, in fact, the full on, one, only other element of diversification that this government is focused on achieving. If that's the case, then, you know, good on you; you're doing a great job because you pretty much get out of bed in the morning and you find a new way to challenge the constitutional rights of one or another group of Albertans. That means that we are always looking for new private-sector lawyers, not lawyers paid for by the government, of course, because we've decided to fire 90 of those. Instead, we'll go to the private sector and . . .

Ms Hoffman: Contract them out.

Ms Notley: . . . contract them out and now pay them $400 an hour. That won't cost anybody any more money, said no one ever. Anyway, that's not necessarily what we're dealing with in this bill.

The point is that what you should be doing is sitting down respectfully with these doctors to find a solution to these problems. If you can't, there may be other solutions that the government should be initiating. I'll be honest. We were looking at some of those, too, because we definitely need to fix some of the problems that were created by the deal that was negotiated by the previous PC government. What I will say is that this is not the way to do it, because this is petty. You're going to lose, and you're going to spend money losing, and you're going to make a difficult relationship worse. Strategically, it's just a thoughtless approach. Ultimately, it's not going to help rural health care, which I believe is probably what you're trying to do, but it's not going to work.

Ms Hoffman: I don't know if it is, actually.

Ms Notley: You know, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora doesn't think that they're actually trying to do that. She probably knows better than me because she's more attuned to the subtleties of these issues. In any event, it's not going to end well.

Then we see this whole issue with respect to enabling the change in the policing formula. Now, that's a fun one, I have to say. I mean, the Attorney General – wow. He's quite a character. He at various times makes various claims, and one does need, certainly, assistance in keeping track of the whole thing. Nonetheless, at one point he passionately claimed that this government would pay for 500 new police officers in rural Alberta. You know, in theory that's a very good idea, and I'm glad to hear that they were thinking about it because we all know that before they took over government, they actually took the time to vote against our government's more modest approach on reducing ... [Ms Notley's speaking time expired] Oh. My apologies.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-City Centre has risen to speak.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I deeply appreciated the words we were hearing from the Official Opposition leader. It certainly inspired me to want to stand up and just acknowledge how much I appreciated what she had to say. I imagine if I were to take my seat, she might have a bit more.

The Deputy Chair: I see the hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition has risen to speak.

Ms Notley: Thank you. I thought I was going to get through all this in 20 minutes. I will certainly attempt to get through the rest of this as quickly as I can.

Anyway, we know that before the last election the members opposite actually voted for the actual funding increases that our government had put forward in order to specifically target rural crime and bring down the frequency and the incidence of rural crime. In fact, we saw that that targeted funding was achieving that very result. It's interesting because it was actually funding from the government of Alberta and it was also working. Instead, what happened is that the members opposite decided: no; we need to do something bold and big, and we're going to put 500 new police officers into rural Alberta. That then changed today to 300 police officers, and then, of course, it became clear that, no, the government of Alberta isn't putting those 300 police officers in. The municipalities are putting those 300 police officers in, and the taxpayers living in those small municipalities will be paying the cost of that. I think, again, if you were to look up bait and switch in the dictionary, one could actually use this example as sort of a classic caricature of baiting and switching. Anyway, that is what is enabled under this legislation and, for the reasons I just described, doesn't make a lot of sense to us.

Now, we've also talked as well about how this bill serves to undermine collective bargaining. It does that by allowing for scabs should there be a strike in the public sector. You know, people with expertise in labour relations across this country understand that the best way to extend and polarize and weaponize a labour dispute is to bring in scabs and that, in fact, if you don't do that, you are much more likely to get to a resolution, which frankly is the fundamental objective of collective bargaining, for people to actually have some semblance of equal say and then to find a deal. I'm sure people here have heard me say this before: the best deal is one that nobody likes, either side. If both sides walk away from the deal irritated, it probably means you landed on exactly the right deal. That's what you need to do in collective bargaining. That's what negotiating is about, but it doesn't make things any better by allowing for the introduction of scabs. We've never had that in Alberta, yet this government is so hostile to the notion of workers coming together to support each other and to commodify their resource, which is their labour, in a strategic way to bargain most effectively with their employer. This is nuts and bolts. This isn't, you know, some extremist left-wing thing. I mean, collective bargaining has been a common feature of modern industrial society for a couple of centuries now. It is a way to ensure that people get things like, oh, wages.

We talked yesterday about how the members opposite are kind of opposed to the paying of wages to certain employees. Nonetheless, the majority of people actually think that a guarantee of wages after you've done some work is a good thing, and the majority of people actually think that a guarantee of fair wages is a good thing. It's not just a principle in and of itself; it's actually good economics. There are so many economic experts out there who will tell you that profound inequality stifles economic growth and ultimately leads to economic crisis whereas greater equality ultimately leads to greater purchasing power, greater consumption, and greater economic growth. Basically, your first-year economics course, your first-year history course, your first-year industrial arts course in any one of a number of bachelor of arts degrees will walk you through the history and the evidence around that. I'm not sure why it is that the folks opposite are so committed to growing inequality, because it may provide a short-term gain for themselves or their friends. I'm not suggesting that they are trying to line their own pockets, but it may provide a short-term gain for their best friends. But in the long term, massive and growing inequality creates a similar level of instability and ultimately stifles economic growth.

Now, this bill also removes the regulated rate cap on electricity. What that means, then, is that regular families are going to be subjected to spiking electricity costs. This is particularly a problem now – this is not embedded in this bill; it's embedded in a bill that we passed earlier this session – given that we're moving away from the capacity market and maintaining the energy-only market, which most experts will say is only sustainable if the price on electricity cap is increased roughly 10-fold, from $1,000 to $10,000, which is in essence what happened in Texas. That's the only way that you will be able to attract enough investment in order to serve our electricity needs. Now, it is possible that our electricity needs have moderated somewhat because of the recession, as a result of the drop in the price of oil, but in the longer term what we know from the energy-only market is that we had tremendous energy volatility. Many people will remember the Calgary Stampede in about I want to say 2013 as a guess.

Mr. Bilous: Maybe 2014.

Ms Notley: Maybe '14. The Stampede basically shut down, and people were left on the Ferris wheel because, basically, we had a brownout because electricity prices spiked and we didn't have enough. It was a real problem, and that was what we were looking to see more of under the energy-only market.

Anyway, now that we've decided to maintain that regime rather than moving to the more stable capacity market, the issues around electricity caps are even more critical. This month we'll see bills go up about $7 a month. I mean, you know, not onerous, to use the Premier's words, unless you're on AISH because you've already lost $30.

Nonetheless, we'll see the average bill go up about $7, but combined with the energy-only market continuing to be the primary method of delivery, what it means is that we're also likely to see those spikes get much larger than $7, and that's something, again, that we are asking the people of Alberta to pay for.

I think that, for the most part, I have covered the most obvious elements that exist within this bill, but this bill really is a subset, as I said, of a larger theme. We have a government here that is introducing its first budget. This bill is party to that budget. They ran in April saying that they were going to chase and promote jobs, economy, pipelines. So far we have lost jobs. So far the economy is in worse shape, and projections for economic growth have been revised downwards, not upwards. As for pipelines, the work that we had started with TMX and with line 3 continues, and there's no sign of any other work happening on any other pipelines. The Premier has been in office now for six months, and there's no proponent proposing anything else. We're still working on the same pipelines. You know, nothing has moved any faster because of anything that this government has done.

That's what they promised. Now they also, notwithstanding their jobs, economy, pipelines mantra, promised that they would protect front-line services, and they accused us of engaging in fear and smear when we suggested that perhaps that was inaccurate. What we have since heard, of course, is that that was incorrect. They are attacking front-line services. We heard on Friday of letters that were sent that identified at this point – at this point – roughly 8,000 jobs that were at risk. That didn't include the additional 3,000 that might be at risk if they go ahead with privatizing ambulance services. For the love of God, I can't imagine a more misguided plan. If I really sat down and tried to think to myself, "What is the most misguided thing anybody could do?" and "If you were really trying to do something that was unwise, what would you do?" that would come up. Yeah. There they are. Anyway, you know, 8,000 identified in the letters. Clearly, if you read the letters, you see that there is actually room for significantly more losses after that. Profound breach of trust with the people of Alberta by this government and also a whole series of job losses: that's happening in contrast to what this government had promised.

The other thing. We see we haven't delivered on jobs, the economy. We have broken our promise with respect to front-line services. We are throwing people out of work. Oh, right. Repeatedly the Premier would talk in the election about respecting the rule of law. Well, actually, that's the other big thing that we saw in this session, that in fact the Premier has no respect for the rule of law and is quite willing to breach it at the slightest opportunity. In fact, that's what we saw with Bill 22, an overt breach of the rule of law.

All in all, this Bill 21 ties into that overarching narrative around what the first full session of this government has been about, what the budget has been about. It's been about attacking Albertans to pay for a $4.7 billion corporate handout, which is not creating jobs, which is not diversifying the economy, which is, in fact, jeopardizing the economy and at the same time breaking their promise on other issues around front-line services and protecting front-line workers who provide important services to Albertans, and then, in addition, attacking Albertans directly through the elimination of important programs that they and their families rely on a great deal, Mr. Chair.

For all these reasons, I suppose it comes as no surprise that I can't urge my colleagues to support Bill 21 and that I will in fact be urging the members in my caucus to vote against it. I would of course urge members opposite to think about the things they said to voters when they were running in the last election and think about whether this really is what they told them that they were going to do and just think about whether it's the right thing and, on the basis of that, consider voting against this bill. Either way, even if, to no great surprise, they decide to proceed with the many misguided plans embedded in this bill, we will be standing very strong to vote against it.

Thank you for allowing me the opportunity to outline the most basic of reasons for why we cannot support Bill 21.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members willing or wishing to speak on this matter? I see the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka has risen to speak.

Mr. Orr: Yeah. Mr. Chair, I would just like to correct the record on one point from the previous speaker. I think she probably misunderstands the two announcements that refer to policing in Alberta. The first one, nearly 500 officers, was with regard to fish and game officers and sheriffs and highway sheriffs, who will be given new powers and new authorities to actually enforce some of these law items. That's the first. The second announcement was with regard to the municipal agreement with the RCMP as well. We'll add an additional 300 RCMP officers.

So 500 didn't somehow morph down to 300. It's actually two separate announcements, two separate forces, two separate numbers. I'm sure that the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition wouldn't deliberately blur those numbers. I just felt that I needed to set the record straight on that. We are actually doing everything possible to resolve the crime issues in Alberta and needed to set the record straight on that.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak on Bill 21? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview has risen.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'll be very, very quick. I need to address the previous member's comments. The original plan promise was 500 new officers . . .

Ms Notley: Police officers.

Mr. Bilous: . . . police officers, which has since been downgraded to I believe 300.

Ms Notley: Police officers.

Mr. Bilous: Police officers, that is, Mr. Chair. The Leader of the Official Opposition was not incorrect in her numbers. The numbers that were originally put out by the Justice minister are not the numbers that are now being proposed through this legislation.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

As the committee will recall, there was a request to vote on this bill in blocks, blocks A through K. I'm prepared to move forward in that vein. On the clauses in block A, section 1, of the bill, are you agreed?

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

Bill 20

Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019, reflects our government's commitment to address Alberta's economic and fiscal challenges.

Mr. Speaker, before I get into the majority of my comments, I do want to clear up some confusion around where this province's accumulated debt will be at the end of our fiscal plan relative to the previous government's fiscal plan. In an effort to be completely transparent with Albertans, within this fiscal plan our government has included what will be a cash balance. Because we will be in an election year in 2023, we've included in our accumulated debt, very appropriately, $7 billion.

Unfortunately, the previous government chose to omit that cash balance that they have been required to carry at that same time, Mr. Speaker, and I have heard repeatedly confusion on the other side of the House that our debt levels at the end of four years would be virtually the same. Well, that simply is inaccurate. The reality is that with our four-year fiscal plan, the budget that we passed this fall, our accumulated debt will be $11 billion lower than the previous government's plan. That doesn't include the fact that, in our opinion and based on our observations after preparing our current revenue projections and fiscal plan, we are quite certain that the previous government's revenue projections were inflated and unrealistic, to say the least.

Mr. Speaker, the measures of this bill, Bill 20, allow government to better manage its cash flow, reduce needless administration costs, and deliver services more efficiently for Albertans. This is essential work to get our province back to balance. Bill 20 proposes dissolving a number of dedicated funds. Let me be clear: dissolving these funds does not affect the important programs and services they support. What we are doing is shifting these funds into the general revenue fund, where program spending will continue as budgeted.

More specifically, let me address the lottery fund. Nonprofit recipients will continue to benefit in the same way as they have in the past. With the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, Budget 2019 continues to allocate $25 million per year to cancer-related prevention, screening, and research initiatives. Dissolving dedicated funds is a red tape reduction measure that lowers our borrowing costs, enhances our spending transparency, and reduces administrative spending. Mr. Speaker, this common-sense change is estimated to save approximately $13 million per year in debt-servicing costs.

Bill 20 also eliminates a number of targeted tax credits. Our government is focused on a low-rate, broad-based tax approach that doesn't pick winners and losers. Innovation continues to be critically important to ensure our competitiveness. In fact, Budget 2019 includes more than $200 million that will be spent on research, innovation, and commercialization. We are also spending $34 million on artificial intelligence and machine learning.

Finally, Bill 20 addresses municipalities' requests for more predictable funding. When municipalities have more certainty in their budgets, they can deliver better services at lower costs to Albertans. That's why Bill 20 proposes introducing the local government fiscal framework act, which will deliver predictable, long-term capital funding for all municipalities.

I would like to thank the House for their debate on this bill and to say one last time that I'm confident that Bill 20 is a step in the right direction for Alberta and for our province's finances.

Mr. Speaker, I move third reading of Bill 20, the Fiscal Measures and Taxation Act, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance has moved third reading.

Does anyone else wish to join in the debate today? I see the hon. Government House Leader is looking to rise to speak.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we move to one-minute bells for the remainder of the evening.

The Speaker: I believe what the hon. Government House Leader meant to ask for was unanimous consent for one-minute bells for the remainder of the evening.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: It appeared to me that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud would like to join the debate.

Ms Pancholi: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on third reading of Bill 20 to express my deep concern with its provisions. Now, there are a number of provisions which I object to in this bill, another of the government's omnibus bills which crams through a number of significant changes to legislation and will have significant impacts on Albertans.

There are a number of those changes that I object to, which include the end to the interactive digital media tax credit, the capital investment tax credit, the community economic tax credit, the investor tax credit, and the scientific research and experimental development tax credit. I object to the end of the education and tuition tax credits, which will make postsecondary tuition much more expensive for Albertans. I object to the repeal of the city charters for Edmonton and Calgary and putting a new local government fiscal framework act in its place. I object to the bracket creep, which this government and particularly this Premier claimed to object to vociferously prior to becoming Premier but now, of course, has no problem implementing. I object to ending the lottery fund and moving that money into general revenue, to ending the access to the future fund, the Alberta cancer prevention legacy fund, and the environmental protection and enhancement fund. I object to the ending of the funding agreements on 90-days notice for the LRT in Edmonton and Calgary.

I object to all of these provisions, but the one that I'd like to speak to for just a few minutes in third reading on Bill 20 is the one that speaks to the very reason that I chose to run for political office. I chose to run as part of this team, as part of the NDP and this caucus, because I believed it was making significant progress in social justice and lifting people out of poverty in this province. Nothing was clearer evidence of that than the fact that in a time of extreme economic restraint, when there were a lot of tough times for Albertans, the previous government managed to raise thousands of Albertan children out of poverty. They cut the child poverty rate in half.

While I can take absolutely no credit for that because I was not a part of this caucus during that time, I can tell you that I was extremely proud to stand up as part of this team, as part of this party, and put my name forward for election on that basis almost alone. To me, if you're going to run for political office, running to end child poverty or to significantly reduce it should be a primary objective. In fact, I would say that if you're not running for that reason, I don't know why you're running. That is a track record that I believe this caucus, this opposition, can be extremely proud of. I believe it is so important because if we're raising children out of poverty – those are our most vulnerable Albertans from our most vulnerable families – we're giving them a chance at a better life and better opportunity.

For me, that was a main inspiration and motivation to put my name forward, to be part of a party and a team that puts children and poverty as their top priority. That is why I have concerns about the provision in Bill 20 which rolls the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit into a single Alberta child and family benefit. Now, the idea of rolling it into one is not necessarily problematic. In fact, it's true that by rolling it into one, the payments get unified into one payment quarterly, which is also a good thing. That's an administrative improvement. However, while this government has stood up and said that this new Alberta child and family benefit will actually pay more to lower income families, which is a good thing, what they're not saying when they talk about the lower income families who are going to be making more money is who is making less.

Who is making less is not higher income families; it's families that are just at or slightly above the poverty line. The poverty line for a two-income family is just below $40,000 a year. For a single-parent family the poverty line is just under $35,000 a year. So while, yes, those making under $25,000 a year – and picture that, under $25,000 a year; that is a very small amount – will get more money through this Alberta child and family benefit, which is a good thing, I do not object to that, what this government is not saying is that those families who are still just at or slightly above the poverty line, still within a $30,000 to $40,000 annual income a year raising two children, are going to make significantly less. In fact, families who earn more than $25,000 a year will see their benefit payments decline up to $821 a year. A two-child, two-parent family that is right at the poverty line will receive nearly $500 less a year under this new benefit.

Again, while I do not object to the idea of lower income families making more through this benefit, I do object to the fact that it is coming on the back of families that are still just scraping by, that are making almost the bare minimum in life. We know that child benefits are a key strategy and a key tool to reducing child poverty. Under the previous government the Alberta child benefit along with measures such as increasing minimum wage – 60 per cent of minimum wage earners are women; often they are single parents – and providing things such as affordable and accessible child care so a family member can go back to work, a parent can go back to work, those strategies combined with the child benefit were key to lifting children out of poverty in this province, key to cutting the child poverty rate in half.

While this government is touting how much they are giving to the lowest of low-income families, they are doing it on the backs of families that are still incredibly close to the poverty line. It does not actually make life better for more Albertans. Combined with the other measures that have been taken by this government, what we're going to see is more and more Alberta families and Alberta children who will be sinking into poverty. There is no strategy here to lift children out of poverty. In fact, what we're seeing is that they're making life more expensive for the most vulnerable families. We're seeing school fees go up. We're seeing people on AISH making less. All of those measures are actually going to make life less affordable for the most vulnerable.

So I cannot stand here and support a bill that is actually going to result in putting more families into poverty. That is why I will be standing up to vote against Bill 20.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to join in the debate this evening? I see the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have the great fortune of following the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud. Well, normally, one doesn't consider oneself fortunate to follow someone that articulate, but as a result, I won't comment extensively on the child tax benefit and my feelings about it. I think she articulated the point very well. I will say that while I absolutely support supporting the most vulnerable among us, those who live just above the poverty line are not in a comfortable position either, and we certainly shouldn't be doing things to take away from them.

There are a couple of other things in this bill that I think are worth mentioning. One of them certainly has to do with the funding for the green line in Calgary. I would definitely say that I am deeply concerned to see that funding put in jeopardy. In fact, we're going to see city council having to make some very, very difficult decisions about how they proceed on the green line. That was needed infrastructure in Calgary. In the election the current government said over and over again that they were committed to it, that they weren't going to change the funding, that they weren't going to take the funding. Of course, now we see that they've done it. So that's a big concern for me.

The lottery fund is another big concern for me. This is the source of funding for an enormous number of charitable groups: groups that help with poverty, that help with community activities, that help with a whole range and spectrum of different things. To see that money put in jeopardy – you know, the government says, “Well, it's going into general revenue, and we can still give it out,” but there's no clear path on how much will be given out or whether it will change. In light of some of the other moves that we've seen them make, I think that we can probably conclude it won't be as generous as it was before. I think that's a big concern because at the same time the government is withdrawing services and they're saying, “Let us rely on civil society,” now they're also withdrawing funds from civil societies. So I think that's a huge concern.

But I think the thing in this bill – and it's hard to pick just one – that I find most damaging and most concerning is the removal of multiple different tax incentive programs. The Alberta investor tax credit was working. It was attracting industry, and it was attracting new types of industry. It was attracting the video games sector, it was attracting the tech sector, and it was attracting different industries that haven't historically been present in this province.

The reason that that's important is because a diverse economy is a resilient economy. An economy that has all sorts of different jobs means that if one sector is experiencing challenges, as we know – anyone who, like me, has spent their entire life in this province is very familiar with oil prices fluctuating. They fluctuate significantly. This isn't the first time we've seen a recession in this province, and it isn't the first time we've had this conversation about the fact that being reliant on just one industry makes the population in this province incredibly vulnerable. If jobs disappear in that major employer, that impacts the entire economy. If we had more sectors in our economy – I don't believe the members opposite; I believe that we can support oil and gas while simultaneously supporting other industries. If we don't have that larger economy, where people can go to different jobs when one sector is experiencing challenges, it makes us vulnerable, and I think we lose some of that resilience.

The members opposite like to say that they're here to spur economic growth, but I think we've seen this cycle over and over again. This has been tried in the past, this let's drop the corporate tax rate and hope the economy diversifies itself. It's never worked. My colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview did an incredible job of listening to industry, of setting up these tax credits in a way that would work for them, and it was attracting business. What's the saddest thing is that you talk to people, especially in Calgary – you know, I've spoken to a number of lawyers who talk about clients that they had, did have, I guess, now past tense, who were looking to bring their businesses to Alberta, who were looking to move their business to Alberta, who were looking to open an office in Alberta, who would have been moving into those towers in downtown Calgary, and now they're not coming. I think that's a huge concern.

We've seen net job losses under this government, and I think that's a huge concern. Trickle-down economics doesn't work. We've seen it demonstrated over and over again, and it certainly doesn't diversify the economy.

We have had one small victory, which I'm very proud of, which is that we finally convinced this government to reverse course with respect to some of the film and television industry tax credits. I think that's delightful; I do. I am glad that they listened. I am glad that we were able to convince them. But what I do think is a bit telling is that they've been convinced on this one thing. They say: okay; this one tax credit aimed at a certain industry is good, but all of the other tax credits aimed at different industries is just picking winners and losers. I mean, that's ridiculous because either they're good or they're bad. I think they were good. I think they were incredibly good because we saw business coming here – we saw business moving here from other places; we saw new head offices opening – and it would have had an incredible impact on our economy. We're actually not dissimilar to Colorado, that used to have a very oil-focused economy and that ultimately moved into a more diversified economy with a lot of tech sector work. We had the opportunity to do that, and that's what was happening. Now we will lose that.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I will end, but I must say that I am incredibly disappointed to see these tax credits go because they would have had an incredibly beneficial impact, now and in the future.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to provide a brief question or comment.

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to speak to Bill 20?

I am prepared to call the question, but the hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board has the opportunity to close debate should he wish to do so.

Mr. Toews: Mr. Speaker, I waive.

Bill 21 Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019

The Speaker: The hon. the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Toews: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last spring we promised Albertans we would balance the budget by 2022-23. Budget 2019 reflects this commitment. Bill 21 helps us achieve this goal by controlling government spending, finding efficiencies, and improving our fiscal management. In essence, Bill 21 is about living within our means so that we can maintain the high-quality services Albertans deserve not just today but also for future generations.

Bill 21 proposes many common-sense changes, and one of those is how we fund advanced education. These changes bring us closer in line with other large provinces while continuing our support for our world-class postsecondary institutions. Bill 21 would also update our government's approach to supplying emergency and contingency funding as well as other improvements to our fiscal rules and reporting. This will improve government's transparency and accountability to Alberta's taxpayers. Our government was elected to bring responsible fiscal management back to our province, and this bill does just that. Bill 21 proposes changes that would ensure that our police forces have access to sustainable funding and that underserved Albertans have access to quality, timely medical care anywhere in the province.

Mr. Speaker, all of these changes are being proposed to chart a new course in Alberta's fiscal management. We are changing the spending trajectory of the province and doing so in a responsible and compassionate manner. This province has a long-standing overspending problem, and our budget implementation bills will put us on a sustainable track. I would like to thank the House for their time and attention to this bill and on all the bills that implement Budget 2019.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I move third reading of Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board has moved third reading of Bill 21. Is there anyone else that would like to join in the debate this evening? I see the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore has risen.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate you recognizing me this evening to speak one final time to Bill 21, Ensuring Fiscal Sustainability Act, 2019, which I actually think we should be calling An Act to Make Life More Difficult for Albertans. Many things I have a problem with in this piece of legislation.

You know, we just heard the Minister of Finance talk about how we're working to balance the budget here compassionately, yet when we talk about people on AISH, income supports, and the seniors' lodge program, I hardly think – taking away $300 million from those groups is not what I would consider compassionate. I'm not really sure why we are actually, consciously making a decision to take away a mere few dollars from some of the most vulnerable Albertans. It's either a case of: we're looking to purposely do this, or perhaps it's maybe because we want to figure out a way to pay for that reckless $4.7 billion corporate gift card that hasn't created a single job yet, Mr. Speaker.

You know, we heard very clearly time and time again that they were going to create jobs, that they were going to grow the economy. We're well behind in the jobs. It's going to take you quite a while just to catch up, just to get to break-even. Probably, best case, this economy has stalled. More likely, worst case, it is downgrading, kind of like what just happened to our credit rating here.

Other things that I'm looking at: ending tuition freezes, increasing student loans. I very clearly have not heard from any students yet who have said: I want to pay more for that. I can't find them. I keep asking every chance I get, and that is either from postsecondary students whom I've had the opportunity to meet with – having three of the high schools in Edmonton that are north of the Yellowhead, I have yet to find students that are excited to be able to pay more when they get to postsecondary education.

We've also seen an end to the regulated rate option cap for electricity. This one is an interesting one, Mr. Speaker, because we're looking backwards. We're looking in the past, to go back to something that only one other jurisdiction on the continent has. Everybody else moved away from it. You know, maybe as we look at this, I guess the piece of advice I would say: stop looking back, Marty; come back to the future, please.

Also, around PIDs, the practitioner identification numbers, I've had the opportunity to meet with a lot of medical students in differing years of their education. Most have said that had they known something like this was going to be coming forward, they might have even reconsidered the path that they were taking. You know, this is a failed plan in other jurisdictions. They're starting to repeal it because it didn't work. It had the absolute opposite effect. Why we would take something that we've very clearly seen doesn't work and try to force it to work here does not make any sense.

We also see changes around how municipalities will be paying for policing. Mr. Speaker, that is very clearly a download onto the municipalities. There's no other way to describe this. They're going to be on the hook for a lot of money. I suspect that that will get passed on to taxpayers, but, hey, at least the government won't have the responsibility of saying: well, it wasn't really us; it was them. So municipalities are being used as the scapegoat for this.

We're also seeing changes to how the province uses money collected on behalf of municipalities for fines. I suspect that there's one of two things here. Either the Minister of Municipal Affairs does not believe municipalities have the capability to manage this themselves, or they need yet another source of revenue to pay for their $4.7 billion gift card, the one, of course, that was located on page 144 of their budget. We've heard the Premier say, you know, that the real number is the true fact, so I'm taking him at his word. It's located on page 144. It's one or the other.

We also see things around interfering in collective bargaining. Mr. Speaker, if we want to grow this economy, if we want to attract businesses to this province, creating labour unrest will be a factor that will discourage those businesses from coming here. Also, the fact that schooling is getting more expensive: that could affect student enrolment, in which case the workforce that these companies would have access to would diminish. That is also a demoralizing fact for them to come here.

All of these changes we're seeing are presented in an omnibus piece of legislation, something that members of the current front bench and members of the caucus on the government side, when they were members of the 29th Legislature – I'm sure, Mr. Speaker, you recall very, very clearly those times – when they thought that the NDP government brought in a piece of omnibus legislation, were adamantly opposed to. Yet we have one of four pieces of omnibus legislation being presented here and rammed through at the sprightly hour of 1:15 in the morning. I think that is a little bit hypocritical, and I would suggest that you probably would have argued very adamantly against such a thing, you know, based on how well I know you served in the 29th Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, I am not able to support this legislation. It is making life harder for Albertans. It's making life more expensive for Albertans. It's putting Albertans at a disadvantage. This is not how we create jobs, this is not how we grow the economy, and it's not how we lead on the world stage.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there anyone else wishing to join in debate on Bill 21? I see the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think this will likely be my last time speaking to Bill 21. I just want to say a couple of other things, you know, nothing that I haven't really said before. I think you'll remember the days when we passed the legislation around AISH and Henson trusts, indexing AISH and doing that slight increase. I think that was a really great day. It was a great day because we all agreed that it was an important investment in Albertans, and it was a great day for Albertans because they knew that for once they mattered enough that they were not going to have to fight for an increase, to fight for recognition, and that they were worth investing in.

So when the Finance minister stands up and says that this bill is about responsible fiscal management and finding efficiencies to live within our means, it's incredibly insulting to me, for people that are living on $1,600 a month. For a government that is willing to spend $120 million on a war room, to give $4.7 billion to profitable corporations, that is finding efficiencies to live within our means on the backs of people with severe handicaps in this province: it's incredibly insulting, and it's incredibly disappointing.

You know, I know that there are two government members that sit on the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities, a group that I was able to join for a little bit. The overriding, I guess, direction that is set for that group is the UN declaration on the rights of persons with disabilities. I'm sure that the members have read the supplemental information that people are provided. It's about inclusion and it's about respect and it's about poverty reduction. It's about all of those things.

I'm sad that this government chose not to consult with people like the disability advocate or the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities or even any Albertans with disabilities because if you had, you would know that what you're doing is creating havoc in people's lives. They already can't afford to live. They already can't afford their places. For the most part, they end up short every month. They end up with too many roommates, unable to leave bad situations. They end up at the food bank. The reality is grinding poverty. I have not seen one government member flinch and even stand up to consider that what they're doing is harmful. They're trying to enact this fairy tale, that benefits will trickle down to people because you're investing in wealthy corporations or the very wealthy. All you're doing is creating a bigger gap than is there already. I'm incredibly disappointed. I'm not surprised, but I'm incredibly disappointed, Mr. Speaker.

I was reminded by one of my colleagues of the day that that announcement was made. I know that I wasn't the only person that actually cried that day, actually cried with joy to be part of a government or part of a Legislature that chose to be so bold as to say to people with disabilities: you matter, and we're investing in you; you're not going to have to beg for scraps every year. Now this is undone under the guise of responsible fiscal management. I'm incredibly disappointed. I'm incredibly disappointed that none of the government members or ministers have been willing to stand up and explain it or even answer our questions. It's disrespectful, it's incredibly disappointing, and it's an incredibly sad way to end this Legislature. After a lot of sad things have happened, it's incredibly sad.

You will see this. You will see the effects of this. You will see them in your constituencies. You will see them all over. You will see the cost to other services that you're also cutting, but you will see this and you will feel this and you will be responsible for this. On that, I'm going to end. I'm incredibly disappointed that people that stood up and defended the changes that we made and said that, yes, they agreed with them, members that are here now sitting on the government side, now suddenly are silent. Are they being silenced, or did they just change their minds suddenly, that people with disabilities don't matter as much? I don't know, but we will find out. This isn't the end of it. It's the beginning. People are watching, Mr. Speaker. I know that at 1 o'clock in the morning people are still watching. I'm still getting messages. They're hearing what we're saying, and you will be accountable. Maybe not today, but you will be.

That's it.

The Speaker: Hon. members, Standing Order 29(2)(a) is available if anyone would like to provide a brief question or comment for the member.

Seeing none, is there anyone else wishing to speak to Bill 21?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Finance to close debate?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for third reading carried]

Statement by the Speaker

Remarks at the End of the Fall Sitting

The Speaker: Hon. members, prior to recognizing the hon. Government House Leader – and I would never presuppose what the hon. Government House Leader may be doing – let me thank you all for a very productive session. I hope that each and every one of you has a safe, a very merry Christmas, a happy New Year.

I ask that you would join me in thanking Hansard, the table, security, pages, all of those who dedicate their time, their hours, and are committed to our province and to each member of the Assembly and, in particular, on this evening in room 315 Ms Judy Bressmer, who is probably shedding one small tear this evening, knowing that a lengthy public service career is mere moments away from being concluded. If you can join me in thanking them all, I know that I would appreciate that.

The hon. the Government House Leader has the call.

Mr. Jason Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my duty to advise the Assembly that pursuant to Government Motion 39, agreed to on November 27, the business for the 2019 fall sitting is concluded.

[The Assembly adjourned at 1:30 a.m. on Thursday pursuant to Government Motion 39]

Bill Status Report for the 30th Legislature - 1st Session (2019)

Activity to Wednesday, December 4, 2019

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sitzings.

Main Estimates 2019-2020

The main estimates (budget) for 2019-2020 are all being considered in the legislative policy committees. Below is a list of ministries, the schedule of debate, and links to posted transcripts. At 7:30 p.m. on November 19 the Committee of Supply will meet to vote on the estimates.

Meetings start at 9 a.m. (morning), 3:30 p.m. (afternoon); or 7 p.m. (evening), except for Executive Council, which starts at 8:30 a.m.. Estimates debates are scheduled for three hours except for Executive Council, Seniors and Housing, Transportation, and Service Alberta, which are scheduled for two hours. The ministries of Education, Advanced Education, and Health each have two meetings scheduled for a total of six hours' debate per ministry.
